Dedicated to His Holiness, Shri Shri Shri Shivabalayogi Maharaj.

His Holiness Shri Shri Shri Shivabalayogi Maharaj described Yoga Vasishtha as the best spiritual treatise, being the least altered over time. He would not admit to being Vasishtha himself, but he said he was present when Vasishtha answered Rama's questions and evoked Rama's Self realization.

GLOSSARY

agnishtoma — an ancient Vedic ceremony performed by a brahmin desirous of obtaining heaven. The ceremonies continue for five days with sixteen priests officiating.

akshauhini — an ancient battle formation of 21,870 chariots, 21,870 elephants, 65,610 cavalry, and 109,350 infantry.

Agastya — considered a Tamil/Vedic sage is one of the Seven Sages (Saptarishi). He is credited with many mantras of the Rig Veda, and is also the author of Agastya Samhita (Agastya Collection). Once a clan of demons hid in the Cosmic Ocean so the gods could not defeat them. The gods appealed to Agastya who drank the entire ocean and held it within until the demons were destroyed.

amalaki — (Emblica Officinalis) Indian gooseberry, a small tree whose fruit, in Ayurvedic healing tradition, is considered the most powerful rejuvenating medicine.

Amaravati — the heavenly city of Indra, King of the Gods.

apsara — beautiful, supernatural women; nymphs. They are youthful and elegant, and proficient in the art of dancing. They are the wives of the gandharvas, the court servants of Indra, the Lord of the Gods. They dance to the music made by their husbands, usually in the palaces of the gods, and entertain gods and fallen heroes.

arghya — an offering of water as a token of respect.

Aruna — the god who serves as the charioteer of the Sun.

Arundhati — The wife of Vasishtha.

asura — power-seeking deities, sometimes considered sinful and materialistic.

ativahika — In the Upanishads, refers to those who are deployed to carry the dead to the other world. Here, the meaning is the everlasting spiritual body.

Ayodhya — the capital of Kosala, the kingdom ruled by Dasharata.

bael — the bael (bel, bilva, wood apple) tree is considered sacred to Shiva. Its fruit, as large as a grapefruit, has a smooth, woody shell so hard it must be cracked with a hammer. The fibrous yellow pulp inside is very aromatic.

Bali — (Mahabali, Great Bali) an asura demon, was the son of Devamba and Virochana. He grew up under the tutelage of his grandfather, Prahlada, who instilled in him a strong sense of righteousness and devotion. Bali would eventually succeed his grandfather as the king of the asuras, and his reign was characterized by peace and prosperity. He would later expand his realm and bring the entire world under his benevolent rule. He was even able to conquer the underworld and heaven, which he wrested from Indra and the gods.

Bhairava — fierce, destructive manifestations of Shiva.

Bharadwaja — a sage, one of the even rishis, the leading student of Valmiki, and considered the ancestor of all brahmins.

Bharata — (“Emperor”) legendary ruler of India after whom India and Indians are named.

Brahma — God the Creator, also the father of Vasishtha.

Uchchaihshravas — the seven-headed flying horse obtained during the churning of the milk ocean. It is considered the best of horses, prototype and king of horses. He is often described as the vehicle of Indra and is said to be snow white in color.

uttarayana — The sun’s yearly movement is divided into two parts, uttarayana and dakshinayana. Uttarayana starts with the winter solstice and dakshinayana starts with the summer solstice.

Vaikuntha — the heavenly world where Vishnu resides.

Vaishnava — a devotee of Vishnu or any of Vishnu’s many incarnations.

Valmiki — The Uttara Khanda tells the story of Valmiki’s early life, a highway robber named Valya Koli who used to rob people after killing them. Once, the robber tried to rob the divine sage Narada for the benefit of his family. Narada asked him if his family would share the sin he was incurring due to the robbery. The robber replied positively, but Narada told him to confirm this with his family. The robber asked his family, but none agreed to bear the burden of sin. Dejected, the robber finally understood the truth of life and asked for Narada’s forgiveness. Narada taught the robber to worship

God. The robber meditated for many years, so much so that ant-hills grew around his body. Finally, a divine voice declared his penance successful, bestowing him with the name Valmiki, “one born out of ant-hills.”

vasana — the impressions stored in the mind: memories, attitudes, habits, etc.

Vasishta — ancient sage and one of the Seven Rishis (saptarishi) associated with the seven stars of the constellation Big Dipper (Ursa Major).

Vasudeva — The name of Krishna’s father and also a patronymic name for Lord Krishna himself.

Vedanta — Indian philosophy based on the Vedas and Upanishads; also synonymous with Upanishads.

Vedas — a large body of ancient Indian scriptures consisting of the hymns, formulas and incantations of the Rig Veda (the oldest, dating to c. 1700–1100 BC), Yajur Veda, Sama Veda, and Atharva Veda. The Vedic period ends c. 500 BC.

vetala — a ghost-like being that inhabits corpses and cemeteries; analogous to a vampire.

Vijnanavada — a school of Buddhist philosophy that consciousness (vijnana) is real, but its objects are constructions and unreal.

Vishnu — God the Sustainer, along with Brahma the Creator and Shiva the Destroyer, one of the three primary manifestations of God. Also known as Hari and Narayana.

Vishwamitra — a valiant warrior and king in ancient India. As king, he quarreled with the sage Vasishta who used his spiritual powers attained through tapas to destroy his army. This made Vishwamitra undertake tapas for a thousand years. He is also called Kausika (“the descendant of Kusha”) and the son of Gadhi. To Vishwamitra is attributed the Gayatri Manta.

Vyasa — A rishi, also called Krishna Dvaipayana, referring to his complexion and birthplace.

yaksha — a broad class of nature-spirits, usually benevolent, who are caretakers of the natural treasures hidden in the earth and tree roots.

Yama — god of the underworld. His vehicle is the buffalo.

yuga — There are four yugas in a cycle of divine time: Satya Yuga (Golden Age) of 1,728,000 years, Treta Yuga (Age of Silver) of 1,296,000, Dvapara Yuga (Bronze Age) of 864,000 years, and Kali Yuga (Iron Age) of 432,000 years, for a total of 4,320,000 years. A thousand yuga cycles is a kalpa which is 4,320,000,000 years. Two kalpas are a day and night of Brahma.

The Stories in Yoga Vasishta

Summary of and links to many of the stories in Yoga Vasishta.

References are to Book.Chapter.sloka.

Book I: On Detachment

King Arishtanemi

In this opening story of Yoga Vasishta, sage Agnivesya tells his son, Karunya the story of what Indra's heavenly messenger told the nymph, Suruchi, and it is the story of King Arishanemi who declines the offer of Indra's heaven because it is impermanent. Indra instructs the king to go to the ashram of sage Valmiki in order to attain liberation by listening to Yoga Vasishta. (I.1.19)

Book II: The Aspirant Who Longs for Liberation

Shuka

Shuka as a child obtains the highest truth, but is uncertain of it. His father, sage Vyasa, sends him to the royal sage King Janaka for instruction. Shuka becomes sage Shukadeva. (II.1.6-45)

Brahma Teaches Vasishta

Brahma reveals the nature of creation to his mind-born son, Vasishta. (II.10.10-44)

Book III: On Creation

Leela and Saraswati (Padma's body on the shrine) — Queen Leela and King Padma lead an idyllic life, but as they age Leela fears he might die first, in which case her own life would be intolerable. She does tapas to Goddess Saraswati and obtains the boon to have her husband's spirit always with her. She and the goddess astral travel and time travel to see the couple's prior life as simple brahmins when her husband sees a lavish royal hunting party, creating a desire in him to possess the wealth of an empire. That desire manifests after King Padma dies and the queen and goddess see another reality in the deceased king's mind. He is now King Viduratha ruling a vast empire with a second Leela as his wife (III.15-30) — The Great War: Leela and Saraswati witness the great war between King Viduratha and his enemy King Sindhu. (III.31-39) — Viduratha Awakens: Leela and Saraswati awaken Viduratha who remembers his past lives, including as the brahmin who wanted to possess the wealth of an empire. (III.40-41) — Viduratha Killed: In the end, Sindhu wins, Viduratha is killed, and Sindhu rules. (III.43-51) — Back to the Shrine; Nirvana: Saraswati instructs both Leelas, they return to King Viduranatha's tomb in the shrine, King Viduranatha-Padma is brought back to life in front of the two Leelas, and both Padma (Viduratha) and the first Leela attain nirvana. (III.52-59) — There is a twist on the ending in Book VI, part 2. (VIB.156-157)

Karkati — Karkati ("Crab") is a female demon (rakshasi) who performs powerful tapas and obtains the boons to become Vishuchika ("Cholera") and Suchi ("Needle") so she can feast on mankind. Unsatisfied, she does tapas again to regain her original form and learns from a king and his minister how to eat lawful food. (III.68-83)

The Ten Aindavas (Sons of Indu) — Indu and his wife perform tapas and receive the boon of having ten sons. After their parents die, all ten complete tapas and attain the boon to become God the Creator, the sole God of the Universe, at the same time. (III.86-87) — (See also VIB.178.26-48)

The Adulterous Lovers — Libertine Indra and Queen Ahalya, are discovered by King Indra who seeks to punish them. Despite torture, the two lovers refuse to abandon each other. Cursed by sage Bharata, they die and reincarnate together over many lifetimes until they perform tapas and attain liberation. This story illustrates the power of belief. (III.89-90)

Deluded Men Punish Themselves — Men in a desert, club themselves, fall into pits and jump into thorny brambles. They rest in shady groves, then resume the self-punishment. (III.98-99)

Three Non-Existent Princes — An old nurse makes up a story of three princes who never exist. (III.101)

King Lavana, a Magician and a Horse — The magician appears in King Lavana's court and manifests a magnificent horse. The king mounts the horse and disappears for a couple of hours. Upon his return, the king explains that he had passed a lifetime married to a tribal woman, raising children. When his tribal family died in a great famine, he was preparing to immolate himself when he woke up, found himself back in his court, and realized the magician had put a spell on him. (III.104-109)

Book IV: On Existence

Shukra Falls in Love with a Nymph — Shukra, the son of sage Bhrigu, had performed tapas but falls in love with a fairy nymph. He pursues her to Indra's heaven and ends up getting lost in repeated incarnations until he does such severe tapas by the Ganges River that his body perishes. Bhrigu uses his yogi powers to look for his missing son, finds the dead body, and complains to Yama, the god of death. Yama explains the nature of reality to sage Bhrigu, then awakens Shukra who restores his original body and becomes the guru of the demons (Shukra, Venus). (IV.5.7-IV.16)

Dama, Vyala and Kata — The demons Dama, Vyala and Kata (who become known as Bhima, Bhasa and Dridha) are created by the demon-king Sambara in order to defeat the gods in war. Having no prior birth, the three lack ego and are invincible. The defeated gods obtain Brahma's counsel to foster ego in the three demons, and the demon armies are defeated. The three demons experience innumerable reincarnations until they attain liberation as a sparrow, a gnat, and a parrot when they overhear a king's minister telling the story of their war with the gods. (IV.25-33)

Dasura — Dasura does tapas sitting in a kadamba tree. A goddess appears who seeks a son and he gives her the boon. Dasura tells the son the story of the air-born King Khottha (mind) and his grand city. Vasishta interviews Dasura. (IV.48.8-IV.55)

The Song of Kacha — Kacha, the son of Brihaspati (Jupiter, the teacher of the gods), sings of the Spirit abiding everywhere. (IV.58)

Book V: On Dissolution, Becoming Quiet

King Janaka — King Janaka overhears the divine siddhas (spiritual masters) singing praises of Brahman (the Self), reflects upon the meaning, and attains Self-realization. (V.8-12)

Punya and Pavana — Punya and Pavana are brothers whose devout parents pass away. The elder Punya is enlightened, but the younger Pavana grieves. Punya teaches and enlightens Pavana about reincarnation. (V.19-V.21.3)

Bali, the Demon King — Bali (or Mahabali), a benevolent king of demons, tires of life. He remembers asking his father Virochana about attaining everlasting happiness. Virochana explains that the mind is like a royal minister — subduing the mind, one subdues all. Bali gets instruction from Shukra, teacher of the demons, that all is consciousness and does a thousand years of tapas. Vishnu tricks Bali into giving the world to Indra, then imprisons Bali in a cave. Bali regains his authority and rules as an enlightened king. (V.22.7-V.29)

Prahlada, the Demon King Devotee of Vishnu — Prahlada, lord of demons, is the son of Hiranyakashipu who was defeated in battle by Narasimha, the man-lion incarnation of Vishnu. Vishnu is the lord of gods, the enemies of the demons. Prahlada becomes a devotee of Vishnu, as do his demons. Through discrimination Prahlada attains enlightenment and performs tapas for thousands of years, throwing the demon world into anarchy for lack of a ruler. Vishnu awakens Prahlada, explains living-liberation, and Prahlada resumes his governing duties. (V.30-41)

Gadhi — Gadhi the brahmin loses consciousness as he performs his ritual bathing. He wakes up as a child in the womb of a tribal woman. He lives a lifetime among tribals until he outlives his contemporaries, then wanders to a rich city, Kira. There the royal elephant chooses him to be the successor king. After eight years of rule, the citizens discover he is a tribal, so brahmins and ministers immolate themselves in disgust. Gadhi does the same, and as he throws himself on his own funeral pyre, he wakes up and realizes that his entire life as a tribal and a king was a brief daydream. But the dream seemed so real that Gadhi travels to where he lived as a tribal and where he ruled as king. Three times he explores, interviews witnesses, and thinks that it had all really happened. Three times he does tapas to Lord Vishnu who tells him it was just in his mind. (V.44-49)

Uddalaka — Uddalaka practices discrimination, meditates in samadhi, and practices pranayama breath control. The story is an occasion to explain some aspects of pranayama. (V.51-55)

King Suraghu — King Suraghu of the Kiratas (indigenous peoples of the Himalayan foothills) receives instruction from sage Mandavya, practices self-inquiry, and attains Self-realization. (V.58-60)

King Parigha — King Parigha of Persia, disheartened by a severe famine, performs tapas and becomes known as Parnada (“Leaf-eater”). He wanders about and meets his old friend, the now Self-realized King Suraghu of the Kiratas and they discuss enlightenment. (V.61 to 63)

Bhasa and Vilasa — The two friends grow up in the ashram of sage Atri, then wander off to perform severe austerities but without gaining true knowledge. They meet again as old hermits, converse, and finally attain liberation. (V.65-66)

Vitahavya — Vitahavya abandons his practice of puja and yagna (ritual worship and fire sacrifices) and practices self-inquiry. He attains samadhi and performs tapas in a cave for such a long time that his body becomes inert and is covered in deep mud and clay. The sage devotionally bids farewell to the various aspects of his body and attains liberation. (V.82-87)

Book VI, Part 1: On Liberation

Bhushunda — Bhushunda is an ancient, Self-realized crow who has survived countless cycles of creation and dissolution. Vasishtha visits Bhushunda who tells the story of his birth. He was one of twenty brothers born when the crow Chanda mated with seven swans who are the divine vehicles of god Brahma. Bhushanda describes numerous creations and dissolutions, many Creators, Shivas and Vishnus, and many incarnations of the personality of Vasishtha, Rama and other sages and avatars.

Underlying reality, he explains, is the principle of vital air, and this becomes an occasion to elaborate on pranayama. (VIA.14-27)

Shiva Instructs Vasishtha — Shiva instructs Vasishtha on the best way to worship God, which is internally as empty consciousness. He explains that consciousness has forgotten itself, and that creation really exists as divine consciousness. (VIA.29.85-VIA.42)

Parable of the Bael Fruit (Wood-apple) as Creation. (VIA.45)

Parable of a Carved Rock as the Soul. (VIA.46)

Arjuna and Krishna — This is the Yoga Vasishtha version of the Bhagavad Gita. Arjuna and Krishna are dual incarnations of Vishnu. Vasishtha describes how Krishna instructs Arjuna to perform his duty with detachment and go into battle, and how Arjuna attains enlightenment. (VIA.52.8-VI.58)

The Hundred Rudras — The story begins with a mendicant who dreams numerous incarnations until a swan dreams it is Rudra (Shiva). This enlightened Rudra restores the mendicant's body and they proceed to awaken each of the intervening dreamed incarnations, becoming the one Rudra with one hundred forms. (VIA.62-65)

The Vetala and the Prince — A vetala (ghost, vampire) threatens to kill and eat a prince unless he properly answers the vetala's questions. The prince does and the vetala forgets its hunger. (VIA.70-73)

King Bhagiratha — This is the story of how the Ganges River was made to flow on earth. King Bhagiratha ages and tires of his great life. He seeks counsel of his spiritual guide (the ascetic Tritala), becomes a renunciant, and in his wanderings agrees to rule another kingdom which has no heir. He thinks of redeeming his ancestors and performs tapas in order to make the heavenly Ganges river flow and purify the earth. (VIA.74-76)

King Sikhidhwaja and Queen Chudala — The royal couple lead an idyllic life and both pursue spiritual knowledge. Chudala practices self-inquiry and attains Self realization. Sikhidhwaja notices she appears unusually radiant, but when she explains Self realization, he dismisses her as a mere woman. — Astral Travel: Chudala keeps her wisdom to herself and learns the yogic powers of manifesting astral bodies and astral travel. (VIA.77-80). Vasishtha explains how such powers are possible. Queen Chudala tries to share her knowledge with her husband, but Sikhidhwaja continues to simply dismiss her as being only a woman. (VIA.83)

The Parable of the Miser Kirata and the Philosopher's Stone. In this interlude within the story of Sikhidhwaja and Chudala, Vasishtha explains how one can learn something valuable despite seeking trifles. The miser is searching for a lost cowry shell when he discovers the Philosopher's Stone. (VIA.83.16-24)

King Sikhidhwaja the Hermit; Chudala as the Brahmin Boy Kumbha — Thinking asceticism is the way to attain enlightenment, King Sikhidhwaja abandons his kingdom to become a hermit. Queen Chudala, knowing she has to allow her husband to learn in his own lessons, remains home to govern the country in his name, periodically using her powers to astral travel and check on how her husband is faring. She assumes the form of a brahmin boy, Kumbha, who becomes the hermit-king's spiritual teacher and questions whether the hermit is progressing towards his goal of liberation. (VIA.84-87)

The Rich Man Who Failed to Grasp the Real Philosopher's Stone — Kumbha (Chudala) tells her hermit-king husband a parable about a rich man who obtains the Philosopher's Stone (chintamani). (VIA.88, 90)

A Foolish Elephant Twice Captured — This is also told by Kumbha (Chudala) to teach the hermit-king. (VIA.89, 91)

Sikhidhwaja & Chudala (Kumba) Continued — The king burns all his hermit possessions in an attempt at complete renunciation, and Kumbha (Chudala) explains the real meaning of renunciation and reality, and that God and creation are the same consciousness — The King Attains Samadhi: the king attains enlightenment and gives up his need to live as an ascetic. (VIA.92-103) — A Married Couple Again: Sikhidhwaja and Kumba (Chudala) wander the world together and the queen desires to make love with her husband. The queen, as the boy Kumbha, tells the king that a curse by sage Durvasa makes him become female each night. It is in this form that they are married. (VIA.104-106) — Chudala Tests Sikhidhwaja by making a false Indra appear as if making love to her, he passes the test, Chudala reveals her true form to her husband, and they are reunited. (VIA.108-110)

Kacha — Kacha, son of sage Brihaspati, seeks lasting peace of mind. His father teaches him to understand that there is no such thing as ego (personal existence). Kacha does tapas to attain liberation. (VIA.111)

Aerial Man Building Aerial Homes — A parable describing creation. (VIA.112.15-VIA.113)

Shiva Explains the True Virtues of good action, enjoyment of life, and indifference to the king of the Bhringis. (VIA.115)

Sage Manu Teaches King Ikshaku that creation is an appearance. (VIA.117-122)

The Story of the Hunter and the Sage — A hunter chases a wounded stag and comes across a sage incapable of knowing where the stag had gone. (VIA.124.28-34)

Book VI, Part 2: The Latter Treasury

Bhushunda — Bhushunda, the long-lived crow, instructs a vidyadhara demigod who has tired of the world. Bhushunda describes the tree and temple of illusion, and the nature of Brahman. (VIB.5.4-VIB.12) Bhushunda instructs the vidyadhara that the sense of ego is the source of error and the vidyadhara attains liberation. (VIB.15)

Indra's Rule of an Atomic World — This story is told by Bhushunda to the vidyadhara. Indra, king of the gods, became weak by studying spirituality, and is defeated in war by the demon asuras. Indra hides by making himself minute inside a lotus flower, when he imagines a palace and a universe. Countless successor Indras rule that universe. (VIB.13.5-VIB.14)

Manki — The brahmin Manki, on pilgrimage and crossing a wasteland, encounters Vasishtha. Manki complains about life, receives Vasishtha's instruction, and attains liberation. (VIB.23-26)

Vasishtha's Stories: Vasishtha's Search for Seclusion; A Vidyadhari's Song; Her World inside a Block of Stone; and Her Husband, Creator God Brahma — Vasishtha seeks a secluded place in the universe where he does a hundred-year tapas. (VIB.56) Awakening, he hears the sound of a woman singing and explores creation, a network of alternate realities. (VIB.59-60) The song is from a beautiful vidyadhari who grieves because her ascetic, brahmin husband is uninterested in her. She describes their world inside a block of stone. (VIB.64-66) Vasishtha and the vidyadhari awaken the husband, a brahmin who is the creator god Brahma, who explains that she is an aspect of his own creation and that creation is about to dissolve. (VIB.69-70) — A Siddha Master Visits Vasishtha's Aerial Home. Vasishtha has experienced cosmic dissolution and returns to the aerial site of his 100-year tapas. He finds a siddha master has taken up residence there. (VIB.93-94)

King Vipaschit — The besieged king, a devotee of the fire-god Agni, enters sacred fire and emerges in four forms in order to wage war successfully. (VIB.108-113) — Travel the Four Corners of the World: The four kings, each with his courts and armies travel the four corners of the world, walking across the oceans and praising creation. (VIB.114-123) — Lost in Repeated Reincarnations: His four persons get lost in repeated reincarnations; some attain enlightenment and help the others. (VIB.124-126) King Vipaschit, in the form of a deer, is produced by Vasishtha before Rama and Dasharata's court. The Deer Enters a Sacred Fire and emerges as the liberated Bhasa. Bhasa describes his many incarnations. (VIB.129-133)

The Story of the Cosmic Carcass — Bhasa (Vipaschit) relates the story of the wonderful carcass to Vasishtha, Rama, and Dasharata's court. He saw a huge carcass fall on the world causing a cosmic dissolution. What is left was used to recreate the world. (VIB.133-135) — Agni Explains the Carcass: Bhasa describes how he had asked the fire god Agni the meaning of the carcass, and Agni related the story of the asura demon cursed to become a gnat, then becomes a deer and a hunter. The hunter comes across an unnamed sage who tells him his own experience entering into the dream consciousness of his student, where the sage gets lost and experiences cosmic dissolution. (VIB.136-141) — The Unnamed Sage Finally Awakens and realizes he imagined everything. Another sage visits him and explains that all is Brahman. The first, unnamed sage explains to the hunter that the guest sage was also himself. (IVB.147-150) — Prophecy that the Hunter Will Ask Questions: The guest sage tells the unnamed sage that he will instruct a hunter who will ask questions about dreaming and sit in tapas. (IVB.153.1-5) — The Boon to Become Huge: Agni, who is telling this story of the hunter to Bhasa (Vipaschit), who is repeating it to Vasishtha and Rama, describes how the unnamed sage told the hunter that he will complete tapas, earn the boon to become huge, tire of his body, and the carcass falls on the earth, destroys creation, and becomes a new creation. (VIB.155) — The Hunter Becomes King Sindhu who defeats King Viduratha in battle, then retires and attains liberation. (VIB.157-158) (See the story of Leela, Saraswati and Vidhurath in Book III.) — Vipaschit Does Tapas: Agni's explanation of the carcass to Vipaschit completed, Bhasa relates how, in his incarnation as one of the four King Vipaschits, he completes tapas. Indra appears and says he is fated to go through more incarnations before liberation, ending up as a deer in the court of Dasharata. (VIB.159.3-26)

Story of the Unnamable Crystal Rock— Vasishtha's description of creation. (VIB.166)

Kundadanta and the Upside-Down Ascetic — This is a story related by Rama. Some time before the assembly that is Yoga Vasishtha, the wandering Kundadanta appeared before another assembly that included Rama and Vasishtha. Kundadanta tells his story of finding an ascetic hanging from a tree. They travel together and find another ascetic, a hermit living in a desert by a kadamba tree, in what used to be goddess Gauri's forested ashram, stripped bare by woodcutters. The kadamba tree hermit describes his tapas with his seven brothers which resulted in the blessings of all eight acquiring dominion over creation. Meanwhile, their parents went on pilgrimage and sought wives for the eight sons. They inadvertently gave offense to sage Durvasa who cursed their sons' tapas to end in failure. (VIB.180-183) — Personified Blessings and Curse: Kundadanta relates how the personified blessings and curse argue before god Brahma who explains how both blessings and curse come to pass. (VIB.183) His story of the kadamba tree ascetic completed, Kundadanta listened to Vasishtha's teaching and attained liberation.

King Prajnapti — The king asks Vasishtha how immaterial can create material; Vasishtha's discourse to King Prajnapati. (IV.206-210)

Rama's Prior Life Learning under Vasishtha. Rama asks Vasishtha to illustrate how the supreme Brahma comes to think of ego. Vasishtha replies that Rama had asked this same question of him in a prior incarnation. (IVB.212.19-IVB.213)

From the Preface to the 1891 Edition

Yoga Vasishta is an extraordinarily long book that is considered among the most valuable spiritual treatises and the most comprehensive exposition of non-dualistic (advaita) philosophy or Vedanta.

Shri Shri Shri Shivabalayogi Maharaj is a yogi, one who has successfully completed tapas, meditation in samadhi for twelve years, to attain God or Self realization. Shivabalayogi regarded God and Self to be the same. According to Shivabalayogi, Yoga Vasishta is the only book that accurately preserves a yogi's teachings. Other scriptures, he would say, have been altered over time.

Ramana Maharshi, another great yogi of the 20th Century, often cited Yoga Vasishta. Ramana encouraged the practice of self inquiry and one who reads Yoga Vasishta will find it to be the quintessential treatise on the practice.

Yoga Vasishta is the book that Shivabalayogi recommended for people to learn more about his own spiritual philosophy, yogis and avatars generally, and the nature of creation. Everything one would want to know, he said, is in Yoga Vasishta.

Listening to Shivabalayogi talk about Yoga Vasishta, many devotees came to the conclusion that he was Vasishta. All Shivabalayogi admitted was being there when Vasishta taught Rama.

Yoga Vasishta is the record of how young Rama, the avatar of God Vishnu, attained Self realization through the teaching of the sage Vasishta. Over the course of twenty-two days, Rama asked questions and Vasishta answered, lectured, and told stories. All this took place before the assembled court of Rama's father, King Dasharata, and numerous sages, gods, nobles and brahmin priests.

The book is attributed to sage Valmiki, the same person who wrote the epic history of Rama, the Ramayana, which events take place after those in Yoga Vasishtha.

The essence of the philosophy in Yoga Vasishtha is that creation is not a separate existence from God but a reflection of God. God is consciousness and there is nothing material anywhere. Each individual is consciousness, ultimately the same indivisible Divine Consciousness, and not any physical body.

The only complete English translation of the Yoga Vasishtha Maharamayana is by Vihari Lala Mitra, published in 1891. It is a monumental work in two volumes, long since out of print. Copies are difficult to find. A portion of Mitra's Preface to the 1891 edition is included here and it reveals the high level of Mitra's scholarship.

Shivabalayogi & Yoga Vasishtha

Shivabalayogi often described himself as a practical yogi. Instead of intellectualizing spirituality, he encouraged people to practice meditation. Instead of giving discourses, he gave actual experiences. However, he placed a great value on Yoga Vasishtha and over four decades, he often recommended the book to devotees.

As early as around 1958 or 1959, before he finished his twelve-year tapas, Shivabalayogi recommended the book to two devotees, Rumale Chennabasaiah and M. G. Kabbe, who would meditate in Swamiji's presence in the evening and mornings. Kabbe explained how they spent the days in nearby Draksharama, resting, taking food and reading Yoga Vasishtha.

Gen. Hanut Singh met Shivabalayogi in Dehradun and was quickly drawn into the regular practice of meditation. He had questions about his experiences and the spiritual path and talked with Swamiji about them. Swamiji's answers became material for the biography that Gen. Hanut assembled, Spiritual Ministration, first published in 1981. In that book, Gen. Hanut quotes Swamiji, "Read the Yoga Vasishtha. Swamiji's philosophy is fully expounded in that scripture."

General Hanut's biography of Shivabalayogi includes a chapter on "Mission and Upadesa" (upadesa means spiritual guidance), which contains a short synopsis of Yoga Vasishtha, ending with the encouragement: "Those who wish to know more about the profound teachings embodied in this Scripture, particularly with a view to gaining a better understanding of Sri Swamiji's Teachings, would do well to make a more detailed study of the 'Yoga Vasishtha.' "

In the United States almost two decades later, Shivabalayogi told devotees about his consecration of the Brahma-Vishnu-Maheshwara temple in Bangalore and how his consecration of the idol to God Brahma, the Creator, removed a curse by Shiva. When asked about Brahma, he said, "You should read the history of Brahma." He was asked whether there was any particular book that he recommended. "Yes, the Yoga Vasishtha."

Shivabalayogi would warn of the dangers of nuclear war and how one of the reasons he completed tapas was to use the powers to prevent such a war from breaking out. "This is not the first time people have made atomic bombs. This happened many thousands of years ago and many millions of years ago. If you study history you will come to understand. If you read the Yoga Vasishtha you will come to know about that."

On another occasion, Shivabalayogi was asked about avatars. "Read the Yoga Vasishtha," he said, "and you will learn how yogis make avatars and how Rama acquired his powers from yogis." Shivabalayogi revealed that he had incarnated during each major avatar of God Vishnu, which occurs every five thousand years. The last such avatar was Krishna, and the one before that was Rama. Shivabalayogi added that he was a witness to the events described in Yoga Vasishtha when sage Vasishtha gave spiritual instruction to the young Rama.

Shivabalayogi discouraged intellectualizing about spirituality, so for him to recommend any spiritual book really stands out. He said that Yoga Vasishtha, unlike other scriptures, preserves the original teachings of a yogi. He mentioned it often enough that many began to think that Shivabalayogi was Vasishtha.

Shivabalayogi and English Translations of Yoga Vasishtha

Encouraged by Shivabalayogi's praise for the book, devotees in the United States tried to find copies. The only complete English translation of the Sanskrit work was a two-volume set by Vihari Lala Mitra printed in 1891, long out of print and existing copies scarce. A new abridged translation by Swami Venkatesananda, The Concise Yoga Vasishtha, had recently been published in 1984. We asked Swamiji about it and he complained that it was not as good as the original because in shortening and adapting the original, Venkatesananda had made too many alterations. We read the abridgment anyway, and even in that form the book was mind-altering.

Venkatesananda wrote more expanded abridgments, Vasishtha's Yoga published in 1993, and The Supreme Yoga, 2007. Like the earlier The Concise Yoga Vasishtha, these works are extremely well written, intelligent and inspiring. His modern English is excellent. Swami Venkatesananda and Swami Jyotirmayananda, who produced the abridged Yoga Vasishtha are direct disciples of Swami Sivananda of Rishikesh. Swami Jyotirmayananda gives weekly podcasts on Yoga Vasishtha and he has written a six-volume summary of its essence.

How Shivabalayogi knew anything about Venkatesananda's The Concise Yoga Vasishtha is anyone's guess. It's not like he read it. But comparing Venkatesananda's more complete Vasishtha's Yoga with Mitra's 1891 translation, chapter by chapter, it becomes obvious how much has been omitted. The Concise abridgment is roughly about a quarter of the Mitra translation.

Mitra knew Sanskrit and read the commentaries. He was also an excellent scholar in Western spiritual poetry and literature. Those who do not read Sanskrit can only give second hand evaluations, but his translation may reflect the poetical qualities in which the Sanskrit of the Yoga Vasishtha was written. Indian scriptures were first meant to be heard and only in later ages to be read. Obviously a lot of meaning since the ancient times of the Treta Yuga has been lost.

Some criticize Mitra for taking liberties and augmenting the text. Currently there is a collaborative, volunteer project to prepare a completely new English translation of the original Sanskrit (Google Group Yoga Vasishtha). They recognize that Mitra's 1891 translation "is not a satisfactory translation. The English is very poor. It often uses the word 'God' to translate 'Paramatma', etc. But worst of all, it constantly paraphrases and amplifies the text it ought to be translating. But it is all we have for a complete translation."

Archaic English in the Mitra translation apparently motivated Ravi Prakash Arya to prepare an edit. The result is Yoga Vasishtha of Valmiki published in India four volumes in 1999. Arya notes that Mitra's Bengali background affected his Sanskrit spelling, he used archaic English, and some of his rendering was simply misleading. For example, Arya writes, Mitra misleadingly translates samadhi as hypnosis or trance.

There are other English translations, abridgments and commentaries available in India. Vidvan Bulusu Venkateswarulu translated the complete six books of Yoga Vasishtha, but not the supplemental second part of the sixth book on Nirvana. His complete translation was published over twenty years ago in Kakinada, Andhra Pradesh, but is also out of print.

Shivabalayogi said that that he would have a new English translation prepared by a devotee in India working with the edition Swamiji himself had read, twice. This edition contains parallel Sanskrit and Telugu text. The Telugu translation was done by Swami Purnananda and Swami Vidyaprakasanandagiri of Vyasa Ashram, Erpedu, Chittoor District, in Andhra Pradesh, India. The devotee was Prof. P. N. Murthy, an engineering professor educated in Telugu and English who knew Sanskrit.

In a draft introduction to the Book on Nirvana, Prof. Murthy wrote how Shivabalayogi encouraged him to prepare a new translation. “The magnitude of the task was staggering,” Murthy wrote, then added, “There is another angle to it. Devotees all believe that Swamiji was Vasishta and what is preserved in the Yoga Vasishta is what he said thousands of years ago. We hope that through this translation, he is again speaking to the world.”

Prof. Murthy’s English translation of the Book of Nirvana was published in India in two volumes. The translation suggests that the Sanskrit verses are terse with little in the way of flow connecting or developing concepts. Perhaps this is driven by the slokas (couplets) in which the Sanskrit text is composed. This staccato flow of the text is also apparent in Mitra, but somewhat less because he added and amplified. Or it may be that Prof. Murthy’s translation condenses too many verses. He also omits some of the detailed descriptions, so in some ways, it is incomplete. On the other hand, he included one reference to vidyadhara (demigod) love making which the Victorian prude Mitra omitted.

This edition takes Mitra’s 1891 translation and updates the English. Jay Mazo spent a year revising the text to delete the archaic second person (“thee” and “thou”) that Mitra had used. Jay has made a study of Yoga Vasishta and its various English translations, going verse by verse comparing them. I am grateful to Jay for much of the information about English translations in this web page.

To my taste, Jay had not gone far enough. Mitra’s English, even his punctuation, is frustratingly opaque and obscures the subject matter. I found myself editing the text just to be able to understand what Mitra was writing. It was the only way I could read the translation. This quickly evolved into the idea that I would print my own copy of the complete Yoga Vasishta. With today’s book publishing technology, it’s easy and relatively inexpensive to print a single copy of a book. In a little over a year, I went through two rounds of edits.

The Underlying Story: the Enlightenment of Rama

Valmiki's book, Yoga Vasishtha is about Rama awakening to God realization through the lectures of sage Vasishtha. Rama asks questions and Vasishtha gives answers over a twenty-two day period.

This is the same Rama who was an incarnation of the god Vishnu and who is worshipped as God by many in India even today. The subject of the book is a lesson by itself. Even gods forget their identity when they incarnate and require a God-realized master to wake them up.

It is a very long book, about 32,000 slokas or verses of two lines each. V. L. Mitra's English translation is about a million words. By comparison, the King James Bible is about three-quarters of a million. Valmiki describes twenty-two occasions when the assembly broke for the evening. The last day was one of confirmation and celebration, so Vasishtha's discourses, sermons and stories extended over twenty-two days. At a comfortable spoken pace of 120 words a minute, that works out to about five to six hours of constant dialogue each day.

Most of us would be ecstatic to attain God realization in only twenty-two days.

The book itself states that simply reading it can evoke enlightenment. "Whoever hears and attends to these discourses of Rama and Vasishtha is sure to be relieved in every state of life and be united with [God] after his release." (VIA.128.109) (Citations are to Book, Chapter, and verse.)

"Reading this Vasishtha Maharamayana is sure to produce the knowledge of self-liberation in its reader, even during his lifetime in this world." (VIB.95.25)

"There was never a better scriptures than this, nor is any like this now in existence or likely to be in fashion in the future. . . . This is the best among the principal works of the scriptures. It is easily intelligible and delightful. There is nothing new here, only what is well known in spiritual philosophy. Let a man read the many stories contained in this book with delight. He undoubtedly will find this book the best of its kind." (VIB.103.25, 42-43)

Yet among Vasishtha's or Valmiki's praise for the book, it also recognizes that it may not be to everyone's taste. "Should this scripture prove distasteful, owing to it being the composition of a holy sage, then the student may consult the sacred scriptures to perfect his spiritual knowledge." (VIB.175.76)

The Timeless and Historical Yoga Vasishtha

Some say Rama lived about ten thousand years ago. Traditionally, he is thought to have lived during the Treta Yuga, the Age of Silver, which lasts over a million years.

We are now in the Kali Yuga, the dark Age of Iron, which lasts almost a half a million years. In between Treta Yuga and Kali Yuga was the Dvapara Yuga, the Age of Bronze, which lasted over three-quarters of a million years.

Sage Vasishtha is an ancient yogi who was born from the mind of Brahma, God the Creator. Sage Valmiki, to whom the writing of the Yoga Vasishtha is attributed, is also a yogi of ancient times. So the Yoga Vasishtha has its roots in ancient times.

The subject of the book may be exceedingly ancient, but the book itself is set in medieval India. Vasishtha is the name of a family or class of brahmin priests who served royalty in India for centuries. Valmiki is the name under which another great work was written, the Ramayana, the 24,000 sloka epic of the life of Rama. The Yoga Vasishtha is generally believed to have been written down in India some time between the 11th and 14th Centuries AD, only seven or ten centuries ago. The Ramayana dates back to the last centuries before Christ. Yoga Vasishtha refers to various schools of Indian philosophy, Buddhism and Christianity (resurrection at the Second Coming), which establish its age in conventional history.

The written Yoga Vasishtha and Ramayana are much more recent than the traditional dates for the events they describe, so there is no need to believe that the original Vasishtha or Valmiki actually wrote the versions we have now. Yoga Vasishtha itself teaches that time and space do not really exist and even sage Vasishtha and sage Valmiki, the original ones, have incarnated as themselves many times over.

Among many other qualities, Yoga Vasishtha is a book written by priests in the service of royalty designed to teach princes how to live and rule. It abounds in stories of enlightened rulers, the wars they waged, and the lands they ruled. It constantly praises the brahmin caste and encourages the royal caste to donate generously to all brahmins.

Despite its dated style and context, and sometimes questionable or inapplicable social values, the book remains exceedingly timeless.

The Organization of Yoga Vasishtha

Yoga Vasishtha is stories within stories within stories. The entire book is a story (Valmiki telling his student, Bharadwaja, what Vasishtha told Rama) within a story (Valmiki repeating the story to King Arishtanemi), within a story (the divine messenger telling the story to a celestial nymph named Suruchi), within a story (sage Agnivesya telling the story to his son, Karunya), within yet another story (sage Agastya telling the story to his student, Sutikshna). It begins in this context with the fourth verse and ends in this context almost a million words later.

Yoga Vasishtha is divided into seven Books. It would seem to end with Book VI part 1 where Rama attains enlightenment and that Book concludes with, “Thus ends the Maharamayana of sage Vasishtha and spoken by Valmiki relating to the boyhood of Rama and consisting of thirty-two thousand slokas.” (VIA.128.110)

Actually, Book VI part 2 is required to bring the verse count to about 32,000.

Then Book VI part 2 begins as if the end of part 1 never happened. This seventh Book concludes with another celebration of Rama’s enlightenment. “Here ends the Maharamayana of sage Vasishtha with its continuation by his recorder Valmiki and the speech of the celestial messenger at the latter end of the Book on Nirvana, the ultimate extinction of the living soul.” (VIB.216.27)

The two parts of Book VI suggest that the entire book’s organization is anything but obvious.

Book I is about Rama’s dissatisfaction with everything the world has to offer. Only fifteen years old (I.5.1), Shivabalayogi said he was only eight), he is unusually mature for his age. This Book is entitled vairagya, detachment. Constantly throughout all of its seven Books, Yoga Vasishtha emphasizes that detachment or lack of desire is the essential preliminary to spiritual awakening.

The setting of Book I is the same as all the other six Books. We are in the court of King Dasharata, the father of Rama. Not only are the nobles and brahmins of the kingdom gathered, but also sages, spiritual masters, gods and demigods from this mundane world and the many spiritual worlds. This is an example of another constant emphasis throughout the book: the need for the aspirant to keep company with the wise, and to listen and reflect upon their teaching and the meaning of the scriptures.

Book II is about the qualities of the aspirant who longs for liberation, enlightenment. It introduces themes that permeate the rest of the book: dispassion, control over one’s desires, company of the wise, study of the scriptures, and self-inquiry.

The titles of the remaining five Books provide the reader with little guidance. Book III is entitled creation, Book IV is on existence, Book V is about dissolution or abiding in stillness, and Book VI is on nirvana or liberation, its part 2 labeled the “latter treasury.” But the contents of all but the first Book are permeated with the need for dispassion and abandonment of desires, creation and its existence and dissolution, and the nature of nirvana or Self realization. All these subjects are intermingled repeatedly throughout the book.

Similes & Metaphors

The similes and metaphors in Yoga Vasishtha are repetitive and seemingly endless, often obscuring the simple thought being expressed. “What I will say, by opposite similes, right reasoning, graceful style, and good sense of the words in which they shall be conveyed to you, cannot fail to come to your heart.” (III.84.47)

We might mistake a rope for a snake until we examine more closely and realize our mistake. We mistake a desert mirage for water. Through a thin cloud layer we see a second moon. The appearance of phenomena is like waves on the ocean or jewelry made out of gold. There is no difference in the substance (water and gold), only the appearance. Seeing a snake in a rope, water in a mirage, horns on a rabbit, castles in the sky, a barren woman’s son, and a double moon are repeated endlessly. A metaphor frequently cited in Venkatesananda’s English abridgments is a crow landing on a coconut tree and a coconut simultaneously falling. The meaning is that we mistakenly assume there is a cause-and-effect relationship. Although a frequent metaphor in Advaita writing, it appears only twice in Mitra’s translation.

It seems that Vasishtha is incapable of making a statement without a simile. “Whatever . . . compositions are adorned with measured sentences and graceful diction, all these are rendered acutely insightful through conspicuous comparisons, as the world is enlightened by cooling moonbeams. Therefore almost every verse in this work is embellished with a suitable comparison.” (III.84.47)

Ornate, baroque language may have been the fashion in medieval India, but it makes for a tough read for a modern reader. One wishes a modern day sage would re-write the book, using similes and metaphors more sparingly. Perhaps the modern sage could employ more modern comparisons, like movie projectors and screens, television programs, and computer clouds.

Like creation itself, Yoga Vasishtha seems repetitive, sometimes irrelevant, and seemingly endless. But the only way to describe God is through simile and metaphor. There is no word or concept that can describe consciousness, God. “The soul being inexpressible in words proves to be described only in negative terms.” (V.34.101) “No conception of God can be true.” (VIA.49.24)

We are so habituated to believing our senses and desiring the things of this world that repetition and effort are necessary to become established in the truth. “The repetition of a lesson serves to impress it more deeply in the memory of inattentive persons.” (VIB.198.1) “But because the human mind is like a child, it must not be forced. The training of a child is like that of the mind. It is done slowly by gentleness and indulgence, and not by force or hurry.” (II.9.32-33)

As one reads what seems repetitive or irrelevant, the ideas and images become more deeply impressed in the mind. We realize it’s true because it is a part of who we are. As one reads, one argues with the book. As one re-reads, ideas occur. Realization happens.

So the length or complexity of the book ought not deter any of us. It’s part of the process. The rewards are there.

The Essence of Yoga Vasishta

Everything we can think in our minds or perceive with any of our organs of sense is an expression of the consciousness of God. God created nothing tangible or material. All that seems to exist is only an appearance of God, like waves on the ocean.

There are at least three ways to know this truth: logic, ordinary experience, and God realization.

Reason

Logic involves the implausibility of any other explanation. Reason and inquiry must conclude that all is God. If God is all powerful, all knowing, and all present, how can anything exist that is not God?

The process of self-inquiry or discrimination is the path of jnana yoga. In modern times, the best known exponent of self-inquiry is Ramana Maharshi. Shivabalayogi taught meditation and Ramana taught self-inquiry. They are the same thing. As Shivabalayogi explained, “Each teaches what his guru taught him. Ramana Maharshi taught self-inquiry, which is the same thing that Swamiji is teaching.”

We think we are our bodies, but if we search our own consciousness, we realize that it is not located in the body or even confined to it. Consciousness is not material and it is implausible to think that God is material. God is spirit.

Like can only create like. “The essence of consciousness is not material so it cannot be the cause of a material thing.” (VIB.55.2) It is impossible for spirit to create material. Therefore material creation is an illusion. It exists only in consciousness.

Dreams

The ordinary experience which confirms this truth is dreaming. “The example of the dream is the best illustration of creation. You can judge creation well by the nature of the dreams you have every night.” (VIB.168.20)

“Know, O son of Raghu’s race, that this world is a display of the vast kingdom of your imagination. It will vanish into nothing when you come to good understanding by the grace of your God. Then you will see the whole as clearly as the light of the rising sun, and you will know this world is like a creation of your dream.” (VIA.28.29-31)

“To the clear mind this world appears like an fleeting dream . . .” (VIA.67.13-14)

While we dream, the dream appears real. But when we wake up, we know the dream was an illusion, a fanciful creation of the mind and its consciousness. The only difference between sleep-dreams and awake-dreams is duration and consistency, which relate to the level of consciousness that is doing the dreaming. When we die, we wake up from our life-dream and, at least for a moment, realize it was all a dream. But then our minds start thinking and we create another life-dream for ourselves.

Direct Experience

Those who have attained Self realization experience the truth that all is a reflection of God. They are the spiritual masters beyond all desires and the ordinary limitations of the mind. Their personal experience, indescribable in words, is that only Divine Consciousness and Bliss exists. “After egoism and mental powers are extinguished and all feelings in oneself subside, a transcendent ecstasy arises in the soul called divine or perfect joy and bliss. This bliss is attainable only by yoga meditation and in some ways can be compared to sound sleep. But it cannot be described with words, O Rama. It must be perceived in the heart.” (V.64.51-52)

The personal experience of yogis confirms that creation is only consciousness, like a dream. “Rama, I have told you all this from my own personal perception and not by any guesswork. Through their purely intelligent bodies, yogis like ourselves have come to the clear sight of these things in nature which are otherwise unknowable to the material body or mind. Thus the world of which I have spoken appears to us as in a dream, and not in any other aspect as it is viewed by others.” (VIB.128.1-2)

“There is truly only consciousness in reality. All other existence is truly consciousness and full of consciousness. The mind is consciousness, and I, you, and these people are collectively the same consciousness.” (V.26.11-12)

Most of Yoga Vasishtha consists of stories and stories within stories, and these stories illustrate the power of consciousness to travel, experience and create everywhere and everything. “By the application of a bit of their intelligence, yogis convert the world to empty air or fill the hollow air with the three worlds.” (VIB.37.73)

“Rama, know that this world is like a dream that is common to all living beings.” (VIA.52.1)

Stories in Yoga Vasishtha

Vasishta spends considerable time answering Rama's questions and lecturing on various spiritual subjects, but most of Yoga Vasishtha is stories that illustrate the nature of reality. These stories, like the similes and metaphors, serve to impress understanding upon the mind.

The first long story is in Book III and is about Queen Leela and King Padma. (III.15-58, with a twist on the ending in VIB.156-157) They lead an idyllic life, but as they age Leela fears he might die first, in which case her own life would be intolerable. So she does tapas to Goddess Saraswati and obtains the boon to have her husband's spirit always with her. She and the goddess astral travel and time travel to see the couple's prior life as simple brahmins, and the origin of her husband's desire to possess the wealth of an empire. That desire manifests after King Padma dies and the queen and goddess see another reality in the deceased king's mind. He is now King Viduratha ruling a vast empire with a second Leela as his wife, then battling his enemy King Sindhu. In the end, King Sindhu wins, King Viduratha is killed, King Padma is brought back to life in front of the two Leelas, and both Padma and the first Leela attain nirvana.

The story of Gadhi (V.44-49) is much shorter and involves one of those moments in which a person experiences another lifetime. Gadhi the brahmin loses consciousness and wakes up as a child in the womb of a tribal woman. He lives a lifetime among tribals until he outlives his contemporaries, then wanders to a rich city, Kira. The king of that city had recently died, so the citizens decided to let the royal elephant choose the successor. The elephant chose Katanja (Gadhi) and he became king. After eight years of rule, the citizens discovered the king was a tribal, so brahmins and ministers began immolating themselves in disgust. The tribal who became king does the same, and as he throws himself on his own funeral pyre, Gadhi the brahmin wakes up only to realize that his entire life as a tribal was a brief daydream.

But the dream seemed so real that Gadhi goes to where he lived as a tribal, then where he ruled as king. He explores and interviews and realizes that it had all really happened. He does tapas to Lord Vishnu who tells him it was just in his mind. Gadhi ends up travelling there three times. Each time his daydream is confirmed, and after each time he does tapas and Vishnu tells him it was only in his mind.

In Book VI part 2, Vasishta tells a story of a sage entering the consciousness of a student in order to explore the nature of dreams. The story includes narrations by the sage, Agni (the god of fire), Vasishta himself, two unnamed sages (one the dream of the other), and a hunter who becomes the cosmos, is destroyed as the end of the world, then reincarnates as a character in the Queen Leela story. It is within this story that Vasishta weaves his own personal experiences the most obviously.

There is the story of the ten Aindava brothers. All ten become God the Creator, the sole God of the Universe, at the same time.

Then there is King Vipaschit who makes himself into four, wages war successfully, then his four persons get lost in repeated reincarnations. One of those four persons ends up as a deer who Vasishta restores to a human form before the amazed Rama and the assembled court. That former deer tells the court about his own experiences as King Vipaschit and all the many other incarnations of his four copies.

In another part of the book, sage Bhushunda, a crow who is the only point of consciousness that has survived countless cycles of creation and dissolution, explains how there have been many Creators, many Shivas and Vishnus, and many incarnations of the personality of Vasishta, Rama and all the other sages and avatars. This has all happened before, many times.

There are many, many such stories.

Nirvana & the Living Liberated

Mitra's translation frequently refers to nirvana, extinction and liberation. Today, the words enlightenment or God realization are more commonly used, but perhaps the best term in today's spiritual vocabulary is Self realization because ultimately, God is Self.

Repeatedly sage Vasishtha insists that such words are interchangeable. They only get in the way. "Mind, understanding, egoism, intellect, consciousness, action and imagination, together with memory, desire, ignorance, and effort are all synonyms of the mind. Sensation, nature, delusion and actions are also words applied to the mind to bewilder one's understanding. The simultaneous collision of many sensations diverts the mind from its clear sight of the object of its thought, and causes it to turn about in many ways." (III.96.13-15)

Reality is constantly described as a void. God is an emptiness. Reincarnation is described as something terrible, as is the ignorance of believing in the material world. The highest good is to extinguish one's own mind, to be utterly indifferent to everything. This is nirvana and the reader necessarily wonders, "What's the point of nothing?"

It takes considerable effort to assimilate what Vasishtha is trying to explain in words because nirvana is inexplicable. It's not being catatonic. "I think no liberation is obtainable from stone-like, apathetic trance any more than one gains liberation from deep sleep. Only through consummate knowledge can reasoning men dispel their ignorance. . . . [Liberation] is not the stone-like inertness of some philosophers or the trance or sound sleep of others. . . . It is the knowledge of Brahman [God] as the prime source of all and the nothingness of visible creation. It is knowing God as all and yet nothing that exists." (VIB.174.12-13,17-18)

What motivates any person to seek this knowledge is the same thing that motivated Rama, a deep apathy towards everything the world has to offer. Upon attaining the state of enlightenment, the living liberated abide in bliss and see all as Divine Consciousness. "All intellectual conceptions cease upon the spiritual perception of God. There ensues an utter and dumb silence." (III.84.25) "Know that this state of transcendent bliss can only be attained through intense meditation." (VIB.163.46)

Such a person does not identify with his or her body and has no sense of personal identity. They engage in ordinary activities, as is the custom for the society in which they live, but they have an utter disregard for any personal benefit. Such people are unrecognizable by the ignorant, yet they command the respect and affection of all. The Self realized have a feeling of fellow-love towards all creation. "Regard everything in the same light as yourself and observe a universal benevolence towards all beings. . . . Let your continued observance of toleration preserve you from acts of intolerance, which tend at best to oppress others." (VIB.198.7, 35)

They see all things in a different light. "In this state of emancipation we see past and present, and all our sights and doings in them, as present before us." (VIB.194.37) "When this material world is viewed in its ethereal and intellectual light, the distresses of this delusive world take to flight and its miseries disappear. As long as this intellectual view of the world does not reveal itself to the sight of a man, the miseries of the world trouble him stronger and closer on every side." (VIB.178.59-60)

Rama asks how to tell the genuinely Self realized from the pretended or hypocrites. (VIB.102.20-21) Vasishtha answers that if they act as if perfect, that also is good. "Only those who know the knowable and are equally pure in their minds can distinguish hypocrites from other people.” (VIB.102.26) He goes on to explain that the realized stay out of the public eye. “They are the best of men who hide their good qualities from others. For what man is there who will expose his most precious treasure in the market with the raw produce of his land? The reason to conceal rare virtues is to keep them unnoticed by the public. The wise who lack desire for reward or reputation have nothing to reap or expect from the public.” (VIB.102.27-28)

The Requirement of Personal Effort

There is nothing fatalistic about Yoga Vasishtha. Early in the work, immediately after Rama completes his speech on the vanity of everything the world has to offer, Vasishtha hammers away on the need for personal effort. This theme is woven throughout the book.

There is no fate or karma. What we call fate is the result of prior effort. Although we have become habituated because of our past efforts (desires, attachments, vasanas), our efforts in the present time are more powerful than those of the past. (II.4-5)

“The presence of the Holy Light is not to be had by a teacher’s lectures or the teaching of scriptures. It is not the result of good acts or the company of holy men. It is the result of your own reasoning.” (V.12.17) “[T]he pious acts of men, their riches and their friends are of no use for their salvation from the miseries of life. Only their own efforts are of use for the enlightenment of their soul.” (V.13.8)

“[T]he primary cause of spiritual light is a man’s intelligence, which is only gained by exertion of his mental powers. The secondary causes may be the blessing and grace of a god, but I wish you to prefer the former one for your salvation.” (V.43.11)

Vasishtha’s teaching begins with the need for personal effort and not religion or teachers or good deeds. The book pretty much ends on the same subject. Rama asks whether there is any good studying the scriptures or listening to spiritual teachers. Vasishtha says they are not the means to understanding. “So it is, O mighty armed Rama, that the scriptures are not the means to divine knowledge. Scriptures are profuse with words; divine knowledge is beyond the reach of words.” (VIB.196.10)

“Transcendental knowledge of God cannot be derived from the doctrines of the scriptures, or from the teachings of our preceptors. We can never know the unknowable one through gifts and charities, or by divine service and religious observances. These and other acts and rites are falsely said to be the causes of divine knowledge, which can never be attained by them.” (VIB.197.18-19)

Religion, scriptures, the company of the wise, and good deeds serve to create the opportunity to understand, but ultimately, one has to do the work alone. One has to become dispassionate, learn to be without desires, practice good conduct, study scriptures and learn from teachers. Then one has to internalize everything.

“Rama, you have heard whatever is worth hearing. You also know all that is worth knowing. Now I see there is nothing left worth communicating to you for your higher knowledge. Now you have to reconcile in yourself, by your best understanding, all that I have taught you and what you have read and learnt in the scriptures, and harmonize the whole for your guidance.” (VIB.203.20-21)

Surplus, Irrelevant & Unimportant Sections

Almost every story in Yoga Vasishtha, and there are many of them, begins with a long description of idyllic nature, people and heavens. Among the longest description of nature is when the four copies of King Vipaschit, accompanied by his court, survey the lands they had conquered, including walking on the waters of the ocean to travel to other continents.

There are several long sections, some spanning numerous chapters, describing visions of the end of creation. Vasishtha describes his own visions over several chapters in the second part of Book V, but there are other detailed descriptions of cosmic dissolution.

Kings fight wars and Rama was born to be a king and fight a war against the King of Sri Lanka, the demon Ravana. Perhaps that is why Vasishtha delivers such a long, detailed account of the battle between King Viduratha and King Sindhu in Book III. The wars between demons and gods get extended coverage. In the last Book, King Vipaschit battling his enemies is also an extended description ending with a catalogue of the peoples he defeated.

These long, detailed descriptions of creation, the end of creation, and battles are typically omitted in any abridgment of Yoga Vasishtha, even more complete translations. Presumably, the idea is that these descriptions are overly long, repetitive and irrelevant to why people should read Yoga Vasishtha, its spiritual philosophy. It's surplus or not important.

Creation, its end, and the wars in between are all a part of life. Yoga Vasishtha is about life, how to live it without being enslaved to desires. We may read these descriptions less carefully than the philosophical parts, but to eliminate them takes away from how Yoga Vasishtha works on the mind.

These long, repeated descriptions emphasize the creativity of God. There is nothing so beautiful or so violent that is not an expression of God's consciousness.

One needs to read and re-read Yoga Vasishtha in detail, the full version. Some parts we need to read slowly, others may only create images in the mind. No summary or abridgment is equal to the impact of the original, even though many, many passages seem redundant or irrelevant. There are many obscure passages and many answers that don't seem responsive to Rama's questions. But somehow, it all is impressed upon the mind which becomes more open to what is really going on.

Humor in Yoga Vasishtha

Yoga Vasishtha is a challenging read because of its length, its setting in medieval India, and the subject matter itself, the nature of reality. It doesn't make the reading any lighter when Vasishtha regularly describes people who believe in external reality as worse than beasts. He is dead serious about despising everything the world has to offer. Yet there is also humor in Yoga Vasishtha.

Book III has the story of men in a desert, alternating among beating themselves, falling into pits, and jumping into thorny thickets. (III.98)

Even Vasishtha recognizes humor. "Now, Rama, listen as I tell you the story of the false and fanciful man. It is pleasant to hear and quite ludicrous and laughable from first to last." (VIA.112.15) It is the parable of the blockhead who imagines a home for himself from where he can rule his empire that is a void. Of course, it is a story about us.

Some humor is in the word play. Mitra in his translation notes the use of alliteration in the original Sanskrit descriptions of battle. "The whole of this chapter abounds in onomatopoeian alliterations, and is more a play upon words than display of sense. However, it is interesting for these jingling words and for the names of the weapons in use among the ancients." (III.33) Chapter 165 in Book VI, part 2, is obviously a word play on daydreams and sleep-dreams.

The story of Gadhi includes citizens using the royal elephant to choose their next king. Vasishtha seems to enjoy the situation. "The royal elephant was employed as a jeweler to select the best gem to be placed on the royal throne." (V.44.29)

Some of the humor is more subtle. Consider the premise of the demon Karkati ("Crooked Crab") who undertakes tapas in order to become a needle, Suchi ("Pin"). The needle is cholera. The demon relents and does tapas again and is restored.

It's hard to read the story of Queen Chudala and King Sikhidwaja without smiling. Chudala attains enlightenment but Sikhidwaja, somewhat sexist, cannot bring himself to believe that his wife can teach him anything about spirituality. He thinks he has to live like an ascetic to attain enlightenment. Ignoring the treasure he has in his wife, he abandons his kingdom to live as a hermit. The queen, understanding that her husband will not listen to her, remains behind to rule the kingdom, then periodically visits her hermit-husband to see how he is faring. She uses her yogic powers to appear in the form of a brahmin boy. The king had not listened to his wife, but now he believes what the boy has to say. The wife, in the form of the boy, teaches him that even a hermit can be attached to things. So the hermit-king ceremonially burns his remaining meager possessions, even his hut. The description of his ceremony is almost comic because the king still doesn't get it. (VIA.92) By the end of story, he does.

Significantly enough, Yoga Vasishtha has only happy endings.

Narrow and Universal Feelings

As written down in medieval times, Yoga Vasishta is not a pure expression of a yogi's teaching. The scribes inserted their gloss because some parts are what we would call culturally insensitive. The condescending references towards women and "lower" social classes belong to the pundit scribes who wrote down the stories. One cannot imagine a yogi having such attitudes.

The brahmin scribes who put the existing Sanskrit text in writing were misogynistic to the extent they blame women for being the seducers of men and of less value. But in the substance of two of the most significant stories themselves, that of Queen Leela and Queen Chudala, it is the woman who attains Self realization first and ends up having to wake up their husbands.

India is held up as the land of wisdom and sages. Certainly, we can believe that India may be the land where more sages have lived and the culture of the ancient sages has best been preserved. But consistent references to foreigners as being savages, less enlightened or even less than civilized are a bit too much. "Among all living beings confined in this earth, only the human race living in this part (India) are capable of receiving instruction and civilization." (IV.40.12) This is suitable praise to cultivate the patronage of a medieval Indian ruler, to whom the written Yoga Vasishta was directed, but yogis do not distinguish on the basis of national identity.

The most obvious gloss is the reverence towards the brahmin priest class. Brahmins are held up as the most pure of men and even gods. At the end of the work, Vasishta instructs King Dasharata to reward every brahmin. (VIB.214.30-32) He feeds the brahmins first, ten thousand of them gathered from all over the realm, then his family gods, his family and friends, then servants and citizens, and only at the end does he bother with the poor, needy, lame, blind and lunatics.

If this ending isn't enough, Valmiki, the narrator of Yoga Vasishta, is made to state that upon each recital of the work, the brahmins are to be rewarded. "At the close of reciting these lectures on the way to attain human salvation, it is suitable for every sensible man to honor brahmins with diligence and serve them with desirable gifts of food and drink and furnish them with good houses for their lodging. They should also be rewarded with gifts and payments and supplied with money to their hearts' desire and to the utmost capacity of the donor. Then the giver or master of the ceremony should rest assured of having discharge his duty and reaped the merit according to the intent of the scriptures." (IVB.215.15-16)

The consist praise for the brahmin caste of priests, together with disdain for tribals, shudras (low caste) and chandalas (mixed child of a shudra and one of the three higher castes) also reflect an attitude that we should consider prejudiced. Even so, the brahmin pundits did not alter the many stories of demons who attained Self realization, and the one person who survives all the ages is a crow, Bhushunda.

Periodically, there is a sentence about universal love. This is the attitude that reflects the yogi. "The mind, cleansed of its selfishness, turns to universal benevolence and philanthropy." (IV.35.67)

"Fellow feeling for all living beings makes the best state of the mind." (IV.56.42)

"Know Rama that all created beings are friendly and useful to you, and there is no person or thing in the world with which you are not related in some way. It is false to look anyone as a friend or foe among the various orders of created beings in the universe. In reality, each may be of help to you, however unfriendly they may appear at first.” (V.18.63-64)

The truth in Yoga Vasishtha is universal fellow-feeling where gender, culture, caste or even demons are seen only as appearances. This is the yogi’s teaching.

Words & Terminology

No doubt there are precise nuances in meaning in the Sanskrit and the English vocabulary is very limited in its ability to describe spiritual matters. So it is inherently impossible to “accurately” translate a work like Yoga Vasishtha into English. It’s like trying to translate the Quran into English. The subtlety and beauty of the original Arabic doesn’t translate into English. Actually, it’s a problem of any translation between any two languages.

The Mitra translation does use some English words which may have made sense in the academic, essentially European-centric Asiatic studies environment in which he wrote. A century ago, academics studied Indian religion as if it was a branch of anthropology, typically with an unstated bias that non-Western culture was somehow inferior. Mitra, bless his soul, took pains to write a detailed, annotated treatise on yoga philosophy and include it in the 1891 publication of Yoga Vasishtha. It argues that yoga philosophy is consistent with other religions, including Christianity, Gnosticism and ancient Greek philosophy.

Perhaps Mitra used words like “trance” or “hypnosis” for samadhi because they were more acceptable to academia. Or maybe he thought these words would best express the meaning to a 19th century English audience. Today, many in the West have some personal experience with different spiritual traditions. Some Sanskrit words like yoga, pranayama, and samadhi have become familiar. So today, “trance” or “hypnosis” for samadhi is unacceptable and extremely misleading.

Other misleading usage is more subtle. Mitra most often uses “Intellect” for chit. I am no Sanskrit scholar, but intelligence has too many connotations of rational thinking or IQ. The word consciousness is more subtle, amorphous and appropriate.

Then there is the problem of God and gods. The English word for paramatman is “God”. Unfortunately, we also use the word “god” for lesser deities, even idols.

Fortunately, Vasishtha often reminds us that in the end, the words not only don’t count, they are a hindrance.

“Besides the names that I have already mentioned for the mind, the disputants in mental philosophy have invented many others agreeably to their diverse theories. They have attributed many names to the mind according to the views in which they want to exhibit its nature, such as calling it intellect, understanding or sensation and so forth. One takes it as dull matter and another as the living principle. Someone calls it ego, while others apply the term understanding. . . . All these various doctrines, arising at different times and in distant countries, lead at last to the same Supreme Being . . . Ignorance of this supreme truth and misunderstanding among conflicting doctrines cause the adherents of different systems and sects to carry on endless and bitterly acrimonious disputes among themselves.” (III.96.45-47, 51-2)

“Rama, know that the words vibration and inaction, desire and no desire, and such other spiritual or theological terms, only serve to burden and misled the mind to error. Keep yourself from thinking on these. Remain in your peace and quiet, whether you attain your perfection or otherwise.” (VIA.67.35)

“So it is, O mighty armed Rama, that the scriptures are not the means to divine knowledge. Scriptures are profuse with words; divine knowledge is beyond the reach of words.” (VIB.196.10)

Endless Possibilities

Vasishta & Rama

Yoga Vasishta is addressed to a future king, Rama. Sage Vasishta was consulted because young Rama had become so apathetic that he would be unable to assume his duties to succeed his father on the throne.

At the end, Rama not only attains Self realization, he also understands that one who is completely unattached to the world also should perform the duties to which he was born.

Rama, being an incarnation of a god born to serve humanity on a cosmic level, is a bit special. Rama was the perfect student and Vasishta was the perfect teacher. Rama attained Self realization by listening to Vasishta's lectures. The rest of us can benefit from the recorded lectures, but we may not be as perfect as Rama.

Vasishta & the Rest of Us

Several times in Yoga Vasishta, the sage gives Rama examples of how fully enlightened kings and emperors ruled their nations without any sense of personal attachment. Vasishta's advice and teachings are as applicable to each person as they are to Rama. Each one of us rules a kingdom.

Learn to diminish desires and abide in the consciousness that we really are. That consciousness is unaffected by the pleasure or pains that appear to exist in the world. We can engage in the business and activities to which we were born without worrying about the results. If we use our reason to inquire into the nature of existence, study spirituality, learn from others, and practice meditation, we will come to know who we are and why we are here. Even if we don't become liberated in this lifetime, our lives will be improved with more understanding and peace and that will give us a leg up the next time we dream up a life.

More accurately because there is no time, we become more connected and get assistance from simultaneous other lives and spiritual masters radiating out from to the Supreme Soul to this life.

We need not expect to attain the ultimate liberation. Vasishta teaches that the desire for liberation can be as limiting as any other desire. Ultimately, there is no ignorance and no liberation. We asked Shivabalayogi whether we all become yogis sooner or later. He replied, "It depends upon God, whoever God chooses."

The Practical Yoga Vasishta: Its Applications

Among the available scriptures, Yoga Vasishta is uniquely powerful. The ramifications of its philosophy are staggering. It is the ultimate self-help book. The opportunities for creativity are without limit.

Everything we can perceive with our senses is a creation of someone's mind. Our dreams, silly and nonsensical as they are, are the creations of our minds. See the staggering growth, beauty, symmetry and structure of an oak tree, for example. Imagine the mind that created such harmony, far more refined and controlled than the disorganized monkey-mind that creates our own silly dreams. But we do create our own waking-dreams, our lives, and whether we like our lives or not, they are our own expressions of staggering growth, beauty, symmetry and structure.

"He who reads this spiritual work once, then neglects it thinking he has already read it and turns to the study of unspiritual books, is a miserable fool . . . This excellent work is to be read always . . . This book is calculated to reward the labor of the student if constantly read with reverence and rightly explained with diligence.” (VIB.163.49-50)

“Now you have to reconcile in yourself, by your best understanding, all that I have taught you and what you have read and learnt in the scriptures, and harmonize the whole for your guidance.” (VIB.203.21)

From V. L. Mitra's Preface to the 1891 Edition (About the Historical Vasishta)

In this age of the cultivation of universal learning and its investigation into the deep recesses of the dead languages of antiquity, when the literati of both continents are so sedulously employed in exploring the rich and almost inexhaustible mines of the ancient literature of this country, it has given an impetus to the philanthropy of our wise and benign government to the institution of a searching enquiry into the sacred language of this land. And when the restoration of the long lost works of its venerable sages and authors through the instrumentality of the greatest bibliomaniac savants and linguists in the several presidencies has led the literary Asiatic societies of the East and West to the publication of the rarest and most valuable Sanskrit manuscripts, it cannot be deemed preposterous in me to presume, to lay before the public a work of no less merit and sanctity than any hitherto published.

The Yoga Vasishta is the earliest work on yoga or speculative and abstruse philosophy delivered by the venerable Vedic sage Vasishta to his royal pupil Rama, the victor of Ravana and hero of the first epic Ramayana, and written in the language of Valmiki, the prime bard in pure Sanskrit, the author of that popular epic and the Homer of India. It embodies in itself the loci communes or common places relating to the science of ontology, the knowledge of sat — real entity, and asat — unreal non-entity; the principles of psychology or doctrines of the passions and feelings; the speculations of metaphysics in dwelling upon our cognition, volition and other faculties of the mind and the tenets of Ethics and practical morality. Besides, there are a great many precepts on theology, and the nature of the Divinity, and discourses on spirituality and theosophy; all delivered in the form of Plato's Dialogues between the sages, and tending to the main enquiry concerning the true felicity, final beatitude or summum bonum of all true philosophy.

These topics have singly and jointly contributed to the structure of several separate systems of science and philosophy in succeeding ages, and have formed the subjects of study both with the juvenile and senile classes of people in former and present times, and I may say, almost among all nations in all countries throughout the civilized world.

It is felt at present to be a matter of the highest importance by the native community at large, to repress the growing ardor of our youth in political polemics and practical tactics, that are equally pernicious to and destructive of the felicity of their temporal and future lives, by a revival of the humble instructions of their peaceful preceptors of old, and reclaiming them to the simple mode of life led by their forefathers, from the perverted course now gaining ground among them under the influence of Western refinement. Outward peace with internal tranquility is the teaching of our Shastras, and these united with contentment and indifference to worldly pleasures, were believed according to the tenets of yoga doctrines, to form the perfect man — a character which the Aryans have invariably preserved amidst the revolutions of ages and empires. It is the degeneracy of the rising generation, however, owing to their adoption of foreign habits and manners from an utter ignorance of their own moral code, which the publication of the present work is intended to obviate.

From the description of the Hindu mind given by Max Müller in his History of the Ancient Literature of India (p. 18) it will appear, that the esoteric faith of the Aryan Indian is of that realistic cast as the Platonic, whose theory of ontology viewed all existence, even that of the celestial bodies, with their movements among the precepta of sense, and marked them among the unreal phantoms or vain mirage, as the Hindu calls them, that are interesting in appearance but useless to observe. They may be the best of all precepta, but fall very short of that perfection, which the mental eye contemplates in its meditation-yoga. The Hindu yogi views the visible world exactly in the same light as Plato has represented it in the simile commencing the seventh book of his Republic. He compares mankind to prisoners in a cave, chained in one particular attitude, so as to behold only an ever varying multiplicity of shadows, projected through the opening of the cave upon the wall before them, by certain unseen realities behind. The philosopher alone, who by training or inspiration is enabled to turn his face from these visions, and contemplate with his mind, that can see at-once the unchangeable reality amidst these transient shadows.

The first record that we have of Vasishta is that he was the author of the 7th Mandala of the Rig Veda (Ashtaka v. 15-118). He is next mentioned as Purohita or joint minister with Viswamitra to king Sudasa, and to have a violent contest with his rival for the ministerial office (Müll. Hist. S. Lit. page 486, Web. Id. p. 38). He is said to have accompanied the army of Sudasa, when that king is said to have conquered the ten invading chiefs who had crossed over the river Parushni (Hydroates or Ravi) to his dominions (Müll. Id. p. 486). Viswamitra accompanied Sudasa himself beyond Vipasa, Hyphasis or Beah and Satadru-Hisaudras-Sutlej (Max Müller, Ancient Sanscrit literature page 486). These events are recorded to have occurred prior to Vasishta's composition of the Mandala which passes under his name and in which they are recorded. (Müll. Id. p. 486).

The enmity and implacable hatred of the two families of Vasishtas and Vishwamitras for generations, form subjects prominent throughout the Vedic antiquity, and preserved in the tradition of ages (Müll. Id. p. 486, Web. Id. p. 37). Another cause of it was that, Harischandra, King of Ayodhya, was cursed by Vasishta, whereupon he made Vishwamitra his priest to the annoyance of Vasishta, although the office of Brahmana was held by him (Müller Id. page 408 Web. pp. 31-37). In the Brahmana period we find Vasishta forming a family title for the whole Vasishta race still continuing as a Gotra name, and that these Vasishtas continued as hereditary Gurus and purohitas to the kings of the solar race from generation to generation under the same title. The Vasishtas were always the brahmins or high priests in every ceremony, which could not be held by other brahmins according to the Sata patha Brahmana (Müll. Id. page 92); and particularly the Indra ceremony had always to be performed by a Vasishta, because it was revealed to their ancestor the sage Vasishta only (Web. Ind. Lit. p. 123); and as the Satapatha Brahmana-Taittiriya Sanhita mentions it.

“The Rishis do not see Indra clearly, but Vasishta saw him. Indra said, I will tell you, O Brahman, so that all men who are born, will have a Vasishta for his Purohita.” (Max Müll. Ans. Sans. Lit. p. 92. Web. Id. p. 123). This will show that the sloka works, which are attributed to Vasishta, Yajnavalkya or any other Vedic rishi, could not be the composition of the old rishis, but of some one of their posterity; though they might have been propounded by the eldest sages, and then put to writing by oral communication or successive tradition by a distant descendant or disciple of the primitive rishis. Thus we see the Drahyayana Sutras of the Sama Veda is also called the Vasishta Sutras, from the author's family name of Vasishta (Web. Id. p. 79). The Asvalayana Grihya Sutra assigns some other works to Vasishta, viz., the Vasishta pragatha, probably Vasishta Hymni of Bopp; the Pavamanya, Kshudra sukta, Mahasukta &c. written in the Vedic style. There are two other works attributed to Vasishta, the Vasishta Sanhita on Astronomy (Web. Id. p. 258) and the Vasishta Smriti on Law (Web. Id. p. 320), which from their compositions in Sanskrit slokas, could not be the language or work of the Vedic rishi, but of some one late member of that family. Thus our work of Yoga Vasishtha has no claim or pretension to its being the composition of the Vedic sage; but as one propounded by the sage, and written by Valmiki in his modern Sanskrit. Here the question is whether Vasishtha the preceptor of Rama, was the vedic Vasishtha or one of his descendants, I must leave for others to determine.

Again in the later Aranyaka period we have an account of a theologian Vasishtha given in the Arshik-Upanishad as holding a dialogue on the nature of atma or soul among the sages, Vishwamitra, Jamadagni, Bharadwaja, Gautama and himself; when Vasishtha appealing to the opinion of Kapila obtained their assent (Weber Id. p. 162). This appears very probably to be the theological author of our yoga, and eminent above his contemporaries in his knowledge of the Kapila Yoga Shastra which was then current, from this sage's having been a contemporary with King Sagara, a predecessor of Rama.

In the latest Sūtra period we find a passage in the Grihya-Sūtra-parishista about the distinctive mark of the Vasishtha Family from those of the other parishads or classes of the priesthood. It says:

“The Vasishtas wear a braid (lock of hair) on the right side, the Atreyas wear three braids, the Angiras have five braids, the Bhrigus are bald, and all others have a single crest.” (Müller Id. p. 53). The Karma pradīpa says, “The Vasishtas exclude meat from their sacrifice; (Müller A. S. Lit. p. 54), and the color of their dress was white (Id. p. 483).” Many Vasishtas are named in different works . . . bearing no other connection with our author, than that of their having been members of the same family (Müller's A. S. Lit. p. 44).

Without dilating any longer with further accounts relating to the sage Vasishtha of which many more might be gathered from various Shastras, I shall add in the conclusion the following notice which is taken of this work by Professor Monier Williams in his work on Indian Wisdom p. 370.

“There is,” says he, “a remarkable work called Vasishtha Ramayana or Yoga Vasishtha or Vasishtha Maharamayana in the form of an exhortation, with illustrative narratives addressed by Vasishtha to his pupil the youthful Rama, on the best means of attaining true happiness, and considered to have been composed as an appendage to the Ramayana by Valmiki himself. There is another work of the same nature called the Adhyatma Ramayana which is attributed to Vyasa, and treat of the moral and theological subjects connected with the life and acts of that great hero of Indian history. Many other works are extant in the vernacular dialects having the same theme for their subject which it is needless to notice in this place.”

Vasishtha, known as the wisest of sages, like Solomon the wisest of men, and Aurelius the wisest of emperors, puts forth in the first part and in the mouth of Rama the great question of the vanity of the world, which is shown synthetically to a great length from the state of all living existences, the instinct, inclinations, and passions of men, the nature of their aims and objects, with some discussions about destiny, necessity, activity and the state of the soul and spirit. The second part embraces various directions for the union of the individual with the universal Abstract Existence — the Supreme Spirit — the subjective and the objective truth — and the common topics of all speculative philosophy.

Thus says Milton, “The end of learning is to know God.”

So the Persian adage, “Akhiral ilm buad ilmi Khoda.”

Such also the Sanskrit, “Savidya tan matir yaya.”

And the Shruti says, “Yad jnatwa naparan jnanam.” I.e., “It is that which being known, there is nothing else required to be known.”

BOOK I
On Detachment
(Vairagya Khanda)

This section opens with a description of the mental state of Rama on his return from pilgrimage. King Dasharatha summons Rama into the presence of the sages Vasishta and Vishwamitra. Vasishta asks Rama to explain the reasons for his melancholy state of mind and his indifference towards all worldly affairs. Rama responds by relating the thoughts and reflections that had been troubling his mind and giving him no peace. His words and attitude reveal the awakening of a burning detachment (vairagya). However, Rama has serious doubts about the soundness of his conclusions about life, so he asks his guru for instruction. Vasishta begins his teaching and all the legendary saints and yogis gather in King Dasharatha's hall to listen to this heavenly dialogue.

Chapter 1 — Introduction: Sutikshna & Agastya; Karunya & Agnivesya; Suruchi & Divine Messenger; King Arishtanemi, Indra & Valmiki

Hail the Eternal.

⁴ One Sutikshna, a brahmin whose mind was full of questions, went to the hermitage of Agastya and respectfully asked the sage, ⁵ “O great sage! You are informed in all the ways and truths of virtue, and know all the scriptures with certainty. I am in a great doubt, and I pray you will kindly remove it. ⁶ Tell me, in your opinion, whether liberation results from a man’s acts or his knowledge or both?”

As the birds fly in the air with both wings, so the highest state of emancipation is attained through both knowledge and acts. ⁸ Neither our acts nor knowledge alone produces liberation, but both together are the means. ⁹ I will recite to you an example from old traditions, a story of a brahmin named Karunya, who was learned in the Vedas in the days of old.

¹⁷ Agnivesya said, “Hear me, my son.” After so saying, Karunya held his silence. His father seeing him quiet, continued speaking. ¹⁸ “My son, let me tell you a story. When you have fully considered its meaning, you may do as you like.”

Agnivesya speaking:—

¹⁹ There was a lady named Suruchi, the best of the apsara nymphs, who was seated on the mountain peak of Himalaya, surrounded by peacocks. ²⁰ Here kinnaras inflamed by love sported with their mates, and the fall of heavenly streams (Ganga and Yamuna) served to cleanse the gravest sins of men. ²¹ She saw a messenger of Indra making his way through the sky. Then Suruchi, this most fortunate and best of apsarās, addressed the messenger.

²² Suruchi said, “O you messenger of gods, tell me kindly from where you come and what place are you going at present?”

²³ The divine messenger replied, “Well have you asked, O pretty browed maid, and I will tell you all as it is. The royal sage, King Arishtanemi, has given his realm to his son, ²⁴ and with religious indifference to the world, has set out to the forest to practice asceticism. He is performing his austerities on the Gandha-madana Mountains. ²⁵ I am now coming from there after discharge of my errand, and returning to Indra’s palace to report the matter.”

²⁶ Suruchi said, “Tell me, my lord, what has taken place there? I am humbly very curious. You should not cause me the pain of anxiety.”

²⁷ The messenger replied:—

Hear me, gentle maid. I will describe everything as it has occurred.

²⁸ On hearing that the king was practicing the utmost rigors of asceticism in that forest, Indra, the lord of gods, asked me to take this heavenly car and proceed at once to the spot. ²⁹ “Take this car,” said Indra, “bearing the apsarās equipped with all their musical instruments, and furnished with a band of gandharvas, siddha spiritual masters, yakshas and kinnaras. ³⁰ Convey them,” said Indra, “with all their string instruments, flutes and drums to the woodland mount of Gandha-madana. ³¹ There, having placed King Arishtanemi in the car, bring him to the enjoyment of heavenly delight in this city of Amaravati, the seat of immortals.”

³² The messenger added:—

Receiving this instruction from Indra and taking the car with all its equipment, I proceeded to that mountain. ³³ Having arrived at the mountain and advanced to the king’s hermitage, I delivered the orders of the great Indra to him. ³⁴ Hearing my words, O happy lady, King Arishtanemi reluctantly spoke to me saying, “I wish to ask you something, O messenger, which I hope you will answer. ³⁵ Tell me what good and what evil are in heaven, so that I may decide whether I want to settle there.”

⁴⁰ Hearing this, O good maiden, King Arishtanemi answered, “O divine messenger, I do not like heaven that has such conditions. ⁴¹ Henceforth I will practice the most austere form of asceticism and abandon this my unhallowed human frame in the same way as a snake abandons his time-worn skin. ⁴² Be pleased, O messenger of the gods, to return with your heavenly car to the presence of the great Indra from where you came. Travel in good fortune.”

⁴³ The celestial messenger resumed:—

Thus being bid, I went, O good lady, to the presence of Indra. When I reported the matter, Indra was struck with great wonder. ⁴⁴ Then the great Indra again spoke to me with a sweet voice saying, “My messenger, go again to that king and take him to the hermitage of Valmiki. ⁴⁵ Valmiki is well acquainted with every truth. Tell him my errand, which is to instruct the dispassionate king, saying, ⁴⁶ ‘O great sage! Plead with this king who is humble and dispassionate and dislikes the enjoyments of heaven ⁴⁷ so that this king, who is aggrieved at the miseries of the world, may gradually come to attain his liberation.’ ”

⁵² Valmiki said, “Hear me O king! I will relate the entire Ramayana to you. By hearing and understanding you will be saved even while in this life. ⁵³ O great and intelligent king, listen as I repeat the sacred conversation that took place between Rama and Vasishtha relating the way of liberation, which I well know from my own knowledge.”

⁵⁵ Valmiki said, “Vishnu was cursed to take the form of a prince with an assumed ignorance like that of men of little understanding.”

⁵⁶ The king said, “Tell me who was the author of that curse, and how it could befall Rama, who was the personification of consciousness and joy, and the very image of wisdom.”

⁵⁷ Valmiki replied:—

Sanatkumara, who was devoid of desires, had been residing at the abode of Brahma, to which Vishnu, the lord of the three worlds, was a visitor from Vaikuntha. ⁵⁸ The lord god Vishnu was welcomed by all the inhabitants of the Brahmaloaka as well as by Brahma himself, except by Sanatkumara. The god Vishnu addressed Sanatkumara, ⁵⁹ “Sanatkumara, it is ignorance that makes you forsake your desires for fear of rebirth, therefore you must be born under the name of Sara-janma to be troubled with desires.”

⁶¹ There was another curse pronounced upon Vishnu by the sage Bhrigu who, seeing his wife killed by Vishnu, became incensed with anger and said, “Vishnu you shall have also to be deprived of your wife.” ⁶² Vishnu was again cursed by Vrinda to be deprived of his wife, on account of his beguiling her (in the form of her husband). ⁶³ Again, when the pregnant wife of Devadatta was killed from fear on seeing the man-lion figure of Vishnu (Narasimha), ⁶⁴ the leonine Vishnu was denounced by the husband who was sorely afflicted at the loss of his wife.

⁶⁵ Thus cursed by Bhrigu, Sanatkumara, Devadatta and Vrinda, Vishnu was obliged to be born on this earth in the figure of a human being. ⁶⁶ I have explained to you the causes of all the curses passed on Vishnu. Now I will tell you other things, and you will have to listen carefully.

Chapter 2 — Reason for Writing the Ramayana

¹ Salutation to the Lord, the Universal Soul, shining manifest in heaven, earth and the sky, and both within and without myself.

² He is entitled to read this work who is convinced that he is bound, who desires his liberation, and who is neither wholly ignorant of nor quite conversant with divine knowledge. ³ The wise man, who has well considered this work as the first step, and then comes to think on the means of liberation, truly shall be exempt from rebirth.

Valmiki speaking to King Arishtanemi:—

⁴ Know, O destroyer of your enemies, that I have written the history of Rama in the Ramayana as a preparatory step to salvation. ⁵ I gave that history to my attentive pupil, the obedient and intelligent Bharadwaja, as the sea yields its gems to their seeker. ⁶ The learned Bharadwaja repeated the history of the Ramayana in the presence of Brahma, seated in a certain forest of the Sumeru Mountain. ⁷ Lord Brahma, the great grandfather of the inhabitants of the three worlds, was so highly pleased with him that he addressed him saying, “O my son! Ask the best boon that you wish for.”

⁹ Brahma said, “Go ask your teacher Valmiki to complete the faultless Ramayana that he has undertaken to write. ¹⁰ By hearing this work, men will overcome their many errors in the same way as the bridge that was built by Rama, who was filled with all good qualities, allowed men to cross the sea (to Lanka).”

Saying this, Brahma, the supreme maker of all beings, accompanied Bharadwaja to my hermitage. ¹² I eagerly welcomed the god with the argha offerings of water and the like, when the lord of truth spoke to me for the good of all creatures. ¹³ Brahma said, “Do not, O sage, give up your undertaking until its final completion. No pain ought to be spared to make the history of Rama as faultless as it ought to be. ¹⁴ By this work of yours men will pass over this repetitive history of the world (samsara) in the same manner as one crosses the sea in a vessel.”

¹⁵ Again, the uncreated Brahma said to me, “I come to tell you this very thing, that you complete the work for the benefit of mankind.” ¹⁶ Then, O king, in a moment the god disappeared from my sacred hermitage, just as a wave subsides in water.

Bharadwaja answered, ¹⁹ “The god commanded you to complete the Ramayana for the good of men and as a means for them to cross over the gulf of the world. ²⁰ Now sir,” continued Bharadwaja, “explain to me how the great minded Rama and his brother Bharata conducted themselves amidst the troubles of this world. ²¹ Tell me also how Satrugna, Lakshman and the renowned Sita, and all those who followed Rama, and also the ministers and their highly intelligent sons, conducted themselves on earth. ²² Tell me clearly how they escaped all the miseries of this world so that I may do the same for the rest of mankind.”

²³ Being thus respectfully addressed by Bharadwaja, I was led, O great king, to carry out the request of my lord Brahma and narrate the Ramayana to him. I said, ²⁴ “Listen, my son Bharadwaja. I will tell you all that you have asked. By hearing, you will become able to cast away the impurity of errors.

²⁵ You are wise and you have to manage yourself in the manner of the blissful and lotus-eyed Rama, with a mind free from worldly attachments.”

Chapter 3 — Valmiki Explains Desires & Describes Rama's Pilgrimage to Bharadwaja

Know, holy saint, that the things seen in this world are deceiving, even as the blueness of the sky is an optical illusion. Therefore it is better to efface them in oblivion rather than to keep their memory. ³ All visible objects have no actual existence. We have no idea of them except through sensation. Inquire into these apprehensions and you will never find them as real. ⁴ It is possible to attain this knowledge. It is fully expounded here. If you will listen attentively, you shall get at the truth and not otherwise.

¹⁶ I will explain to you how the high minded Rama attained the state of liberation in life. Listen to this so that old age and death may not come upon you. ¹⁷ Hear, O highly intelligent Bharadwaja, the auspicious course and conduct of Rama's life, whereby you will be able to understand everything at all times.

touched the nails of his toes like a swan lays hold of lotus buds. ²² “O my father,” he said, “my mind desires to see the different places of pilgrimage, temples of gods, forests and homes of men. ²³ My lord, grant me this petition, as there is no petitioner of yours on earth whom you did ever dishonor.”

Chapter 4 — Rama's Return from Pilgrimage

Chapter 5 — Rama's Self-Dejection & Its Cause

Afterwards Rama attained the fifteenth year of his age, and Satrughna and Lakshman, who followed Rama in age, also attained the same age. ² Bharata continued to dwell with joy at the house of his maternal grandfather, and King Dasharata ruled the whole earth as usual.

³ The most wise King Dasharata consulted his ministers day after day about the marriage of his sons.

¹³ Afterwards King Dasharata asked Vasishta, the best of speakers and well informed in all matters, as to why Rama was so sorrowful. ¹⁴ Sage Vasishta thought over the matter and said, "There is, O king, a cause for Rama's sadness, but you need not be anxious about it. ¹⁵ Wise men never entertain the fluctuations of anger or grief, or a lengthened delight from frivolous causes, just as the great elements of the world do not change their states unless it were for the sake of some new production."

Chapter 6 — Vishwamitra Arrives at the Royal Court

Valmiki speaking:—

³ At this very time, the famous and great sage Vishwamitra came to visit the king of men at Ayodhya.

He held an ascetic's pot in one hand, his only faithful companion in life. ²² The compassion of his mind, added to the sweet complacency of his speech and looks, pleased people as if they were actually served nectar drops or sprinkled with ambrosial dew. ²³ His body decorated by the sacred thread and his prominent white eyebrows made him appear as a wonder to the eyes of his beholders.

hanging from his crown decorated the ground.²⁵ In his turn, the sage immediately greeted the lord of the earth with sweet and kind words, like the sun greeting the lord of the gods.²⁶ Afterwards the assembled brahmins of the court, headed by Vasishtha, honored him with their welcomes.

⁴⁶ “I am so glad at your sight that my inner soul is soothed, just like bathing in the Ganges River cheers the mind.⁴⁷ Free as you are from fears and desires, from wrath and passions and from the feelings of pleasure, pain and disease, it is very wonderful, O holy brahmin, that you should have need of me for anything.⁴⁸ I consider myself as situated at a holy sanctuary, and absolved from all my sins, or as merged in the lunar sphere, O best of the learned in the truths of the Vedas.”

to be purified and favored by your arrival. ⁵⁰ Indeed, I am so gratified at your arrival that I deem myself fortunate in this birth, and that I have not lived in vain but led a truly good life. ⁵¹ Since I saw you here and made my respectful obeisance to you, my heart cannot contain itself but overflows with joy like the sea at the sight of the moon. ⁵² Whatever may be the purpose of your visit, O greatest of sages, know it as already granted, for your commands are always to be obeyed by me.”

⁵³ “You need not hesitate to communicate your request to me, O descendant of Kausika. If you ask, there is nothing I will keep from you. ⁵⁴ You need not doubt my performance. I solemnly state that I will execute your request to the last item, as I take you to be the light of a superior divinity.”

⁵⁵ Upon hearing these sweet words from the king, pleasing to the ears and delivered with humility worthy of one knowing himself, the far famed and meritorious chief of the sages felt highly gratified in himself.

Chapter 7 — Vishwamitra Asks for Rama's Help

⁸ “The vows of the rite prevent me from giving vent to my anger by curses. ⁹ Such being the sacrificial law, I expect by your favor to gain its great object in peace. ¹⁰ Being thus oppressed I have recourse to your protection, and you should protect me. Otherwise it is an insult for petitioners to be disappointed by the best of men as yourself.”

¹¹ “You have a son, the beautiful Rama, powerful as a fierce tiger and strong as the great Indra himself. He is able to destroy the rakshasas. ¹² May you now deliver that Rama, your eldest son, to me, having his youthful locks of hair like the black plumage of a crow, but possessing the true valor of a hero. ¹³ Protected under my sacred authority and by his prowess, he will be able to sever the heads of the malicious rakshasas. ¹⁴ I will do him an infinity of good services, whereby in the end he will become adored by the inhabitants of all three worlds. ¹⁵ The night-wandering rakshasas cannot abide in the field before Rama, but must fly like stags in the wilderness before a furious lion. ¹⁶ No man other than Rama can make bold to fight with the rakshasas, just as no animal other than a furious lion can stand to fight wild elephants.”

¹⁹ “Let not paternal affection prevail over you, O king, as there is nothing in this world which the high-minded will refuse to part with. ²⁰ I know it for certain, and so you also should know, that the rakshasas must be destroyed by him. Wise men like ourselves will never undertake an uncertainty. ²¹ I well know the great soul of the lotus-eyed Rama, and so does the illustrious Vasishtha, and all others who are far-seeing. ²² Should the senses of greatness, duty and renown have a seat in your soul, you should deliver my desired object to me, your son.”

²³ “It will take ten nights to perform the rites of my sacrifice, during which Rama shall have to stay with me and kill the rakshasas who are obnoxious to my rites and the enemies of the sacrifice. ²⁴ O King Dasharata, let the ministers headed by Vasishtha join and give their assent, and deliver your

Rama to me. ²⁵ “O descendant of Raghu, you know that auspicious times must not be allowed to slip away, so you must not allow my time to slip. So may I have Rama? Be blessed and do not give way to sorrow. ²⁶ Even the smallest service, if done in good time, appears to be much, and the best service is of no avail if done out of season.”

²⁷ Vishwamitra, the illustrious and holy chief of the sages, paused after saying these words filled with virtuous and useful intention. ²⁸ Hearing these words of the great sage, the magnanimous king held his silence for some time, with a view to prepare a fitting answer; because no man of sense is ever satisfied with talking unreasonably either before others or to himself.

On hearing Vishwamitra's words, Dasharata, the tiger among kings, remained speechless for a moment, and then implored him from the lowliness of his spirit. ² "Rama, my lotus-eyed boy, is only fifteen years of age. I do not see he is a match for the rakshasas."

³ "Here is a full akshauhini legion of my soldiers, of whom, O my lord, I am the sole commander. Surrounded by them I will offer battle to the rakshasa cannibals. ⁴ Here are my brave generals who are well disciplined in warfare. I will be their leader in the height of war with my bow in hand. ⁵ Accompanied with these, I can offer fight to the enemies of the gods, and to the great Indra himself, in the same manner as the lion withstands wild elephants."

¹⁷ "The rakshasas are very cruel in their actions and fight deceitful warfare. The idea that Rama should fight them is very painful to me. ¹⁸ I have a desire to live. I cannot dare to live for a moment separated from Rama. Therefore, you should not take him away."

¹⁹ "O descendant of Kausika, I have passed nine thousand rains in my lifetime before these four children were born to me after much austerity. ²⁰ The lotus-eyed Rama is the eldest of these without whom the three others can hardly bear to live. ²¹ You are going to deliver this Rama against the rakshasas, but when I am deprived of that son, know me certainly for dead. ²² Of my four sons he is the one in whom rests my greatest love. Therefore do not take away Rama, my eldest and most virtuous son, from me."

²⁷ “The rakshasa named Ravana is heard to be very powerful. He is brother of Kubera himself, and he is the son of the sage Visravas. ²⁸ If it is he, the evil-minded Ravana, who stands in the way of your rites, we are unable to contend with that pest. ²⁹ Power and prosperity in all their flourish come within the reach of the living at times, but they disappear at others. ³⁰ These days we are no match for such foes as Ravana and some others. Such is the decree of destiny.”

³¹ “Therefore, O you who are acquainted with law, do this favor for my son. Unlucky as I am, it is you who are the arbiter of my fate. ³² The gods, asuras, gandharvas, yakshas, huge beasts, birds and serpents are unable to fight with Ravana. What are we human beings in arms to him? ³³ That rakshasa has the prowess of the most powerful. We cannot afford to fight with him, or even with his children. ³⁴ This is a peculiar age in which good people are made powerless. Moreover, I am disabled by old age and lack that spirit, even though I am from the race of the Raghus.”

³⁵ “O brahmin, tell me if it is Lavan the son of Madhu (the notorious asura) who disturbs the sacrificial rites. In that case also, I will not part with my son. ³⁶ If it be the two sons of Sunda and Upasunda who disturb your sacrifice, terrible as they are like the sons of the sun, in that case also I will not give my son to you.”

³⁷ “But after all, O brahmin, should you snatch him from me, then I am also dead and gone with him. I do not see any other chance of a lasting success of your devotion.”

On hearing this speech of the king with his piteous look and eyes full of tears, Vishwamitra the son of Kausika became highly incensed and replied. ² “You are about to break your promise after pledging yourself to its performance, and thus you wish to behave like a deer after having been a lion. ³ This is unbecoming of the race of Raghu. It is acting contrary to this great family. Hot rays must not proceed from the cool beamed moon. ⁴ If you are so weak, O king, let me return as I came. Live happily with your friends, you promise-breaking descendant of Kakustha.”

¹¹ “Descended from the race of Ikshvaku, and being Dasharata yourself, if you fail to perform your promise, who else on earth will ever keep his word? ¹² It is the standard of conduct of great men like you, that makes even low people afraid to transgress the bounds of their duties. How then do you wish to violate it yourself?”

After Vasishta finished speaking, King Dasharata was glad to send for Rama and his brother Lakshman, saying, ² “Chamberlain, go and quickly bring here the truly mighty and long armed Rama with Lakshman, for the praiseworthy purpose of removing the impediments of religious acts.”

⁶ Thus advised by the chamberlain, the king called one of Rama’s attendants, and having given him every assurance, asked him to relate the particulars. ⁷ On being asked by the king how Rama had come to that state, the attendant replied in a sorrowful mood, ⁸ “Sir, we have also become as lean as sticks in our bodies, in sorrow for the fading away of your son Rama in his body. ⁹ The lotus-eyed Rama appears dejected ever since he has come back from his pilgrimage in company with the brahmins. ¹⁰ When asked to perform his daily rites, he sometimes discharges them with a sad face, and at other times, he wholly dispenses with them. ¹¹ He is adverse, O lord, to bathing, to worshipping the gods, to the distribution of alms, and to his meals also. Even when we troubled him to eat, he does not take his food with a good relish.”

legs, he stays with a distracted mind, reclining his cheek on his left palm. ²⁵ He assumes no pride to himself and does not wish for the dignity of sovereignty. He is neither elated with joy nor depressed by grief or pain. ²⁶ We do not know where he goes, what he does, what he desires, what he meditates upon, or from where or when he comes and what he follows.”

⁴⁸ “In compassion on your son, incline to root out this annoyance which like a harmful vine has been spreading its shoots. ⁴⁹ For under such a disposition of his mind, and in spite of his possession of all affluence, he looks upon the enjoyments of the world as his poison. ⁵⁰ Where is that powerful person on this earth who can restore him to proper conduct? ⁵¹ Who is there who will remove the errors that have caused grief in Rama's mind, like the sun removes the darkness of the world?"

Chapter 11 — Consolation of Rama

¹⁵ His qualities of mildness and gravity made him resemble the Himalayas, and he was esteemed by all for the depth and clearness of his understanding. ¹⁶ He was handsome and well proportioned, auspicious in his look, but humble and magnanimous in his mind. With loveliness and mildness of his person, he was possessed of all manly prowess. ¹⁷ He was just developed to youth, yet he was as majestic as an elderly man. He was neither sad nor merry, but seemed to be fully satisfied with himself, as if he had obtained all the objects of his desires. ¹⁸ He was a good judge of the world, and possessed of all holy virtues. The purity of his mind attracted all the virtues that met in him. ¹⁹ The receptacle of his mind was filled by magnanimity and honorable virtues, and the candor of his conduct showed him in the light of perfection. ²⁰ Endowed with these various virtues and decorated by his necklace and fine apparel, Rama the support of Raghu’s race, approached with a smiling face.

relations, and lastly his elders and well wishing friends. ²⁴ Then he received and returned the salutations of the chiefs and princes as they bowed to him with graceful motions of their heads and respectful addresses.

²⁸ “My son, be seated upon my lap,” said the king to Rama who, however, took his seat on a fine piece of cloth spread on the floor by his servants. ²⁹ The king then said, “O my son and receptacle of blessings, you have attained the age of discretion, so do not put yourself to that state of self-mortification as the dull-headed do from their crazy understandings. ³⁰ Know that one attains merit by following the course of his elders, guides and brahmins, and not by his persistence in error. ³¹ So long as we do not allow the seeds of error to have access to us, so long will the train of our misfortunes lie at a distance.”

Being thus asked by the chief of the sages with soothing words, Rama answered in a soft and graceful speech replete with good sense. ²“O venerable sage, untutored though I am, I will tell you in truth all the particulars as you asked. For who would disobey the bidding of the wise?”

Rama speaking:—

³ Since I was born in this my father's palace, I have remained here, grown up, and received my education. ⁴ Then, O leader of sages, desiring to learn good customs, I set out to travel to holy places all over this sea-surrounded earth. ⁵ By this time, a series of reflections arose in my mind that shook my confidence in worldly objects. ⁶ I employed my mind to discriminate the nature of things, which gradually led me to discard all thoughts of sensual enjoyments.

⁷ What are worldly pleasures good for, and why do men multiply on earth? Men are born to die, and they die to be born again. ⁸ There is no stability in the tendencies of beings whether movable or immovable. They all tend to vice, decay and danger, and all our possessions become the grounds of our poverty.

¹⁴ Ah! After long, I perceive that we have insensibly fallen into errors, like senseless stags falling into caverns in the wilderness. ¹⁵ Of what use is royalty and these enjoyments to me? What am I and where do all these things come from? They are only vanities. Let them continue as such without any good or loss to anybody. ¹⁶ Reasoning in this manner, O holy brahmin, I came to be disgusted with the world, like a traveler in a desert.

²² The weight of worldly miseries sits heavy on my heart like a rock and obstructs the breathing of my lungs. I have a mind to weep, but I am prevented from shedding tears for fear of my people. ²³ My tearless weeping and speechless mouth give no indication to anybody of my inner sorrow. My consciousness is silent witness to my solitude. ²⁴ I wait to think on the positive and negative states, as a ruined man bewails to reflect on his former state of affluence.²⁵ I take prosperity to be a seducing cheat, for it deludes the mind, impairs good qualities, and spreads the net of our miseries.²⁶ To me, like one fallen into great difficulties, no riches, offspring, consorts or home affords any delight, but they seem to be misery.

²⁷ Like a wild elephant in chains, I find no rest in my mind reflecting on the various evils of the world, and thinking on the causes of our frailties.²⁸ There are wicked passions prying at all times, under the dark mist of the night of our ignorance. There are hundreds of objects which, like so many cunning rogues, are about all men in broad daylight, lurking on all sides to rob us of our reason. What mighty champions can we delegate to fight with these other than our own knowledge of truth?

O sage, here wealth is reckoned a blessing, yet she is the cause of our troubles and errors. ² She bears away like a river in the rainy season. All high-spirited simpletons are overpowered by her current.

¹⁵ Fortune is a frost to those who are bound to asceticism, and is like the night to the owls of libertinism. She is an eclipse to the moonlight of reason, and like moonbeams to the bloom of the lilies of folly. ¹⁶ She is as transitory as the rainbow, and as pleasant to see by the play of her colors. She is as fickle as lightening which vanishes as quickly as it appears. Hence none but the ignorant have reliance on her. ¹⁷ She is as unsteady as a well born maiden following a base born man to the woods. She is like a mirage that tempts runaways to fall to it as the doe. ¹⁸ Unsteady as a wave, she is never steady in any place, like the flickering flame of a lamp. So her leaning is known to nobody. ¹⁹ She, like the lioness, is ever quick to fight, and like the leader of elephants, she is favorable to her partisans. She is as sharp as the blade of a sword, and she is the patroness of sharp-witted sharpsters.

Chapter 14 — Denunciation of Human Life

¹ Human life is as frail as a drop of water trembling on the tip of a leaflet. Life breaking loose from its bodily imprisonment out of its proper season is as irrepressible as a raving madman. ² The lives of those whose minds are infected by the poison of worldly affairs, and who are incapable of judging for themselves, are only causes for their torment.

⁹ This world (samsara) is as a whirlpool in the ocean of creation, and every individual body is as impermanent as foam, froth or a bubble, which can give me no relish in this life. ¹⁰ True living is gain which is worth gaining, which has no cause of sorrow or remorse, and which is a state of transcendental tranquility. ¹¹ There is a vegetable life in plants, and an animal life in beasts and birds. Man leads a thinking life, but true life is above thoughts. ¹² All those living beings who being born here once do not return are said to have lived well in this earth. The rest are no better than old asses.

¹⁶ As a house is slowly dilapidated by the mice continually burrowing under it, so is the body of the living gradually corroded by the teeth of time boring within it. ¹⁷ Deadly diseases breed within the body, feed upon our vital breath, like poisonous snakes born in caves of the woods consume the meadow air. ¹⁸ As the withered tree is perforated by small worms residing in them, so our bodies are continually wasted by many inborn diseases and harmful secretions. ¹⁹ Death is constantly staring and growling at our face, as a cat looks and purrs at a mouse in order to devour it. ²⁰ Old age wastes us as soon as a glutton digests his food, and it reduces one to weakness as an old harlot left with no charm other than her make-up and perfumes.

Egoism springs from false conceit fostered by vanity. I am much afraid of this enemy, baneful egotism.

² All men in this diversified world, even the very poorest of them, fall into the dungeon of evils and misdeeds under the influence of ego. ³ All accidents, anxieties, troubles and wicked exertions proceed from ego and self-confidence. Hence I deem ego to be like a disease.

⁸ I am not Rama the prince. I have no desire, nor should I wish for wealth, but I wish to have the peace of my mind and remain like the self-satisfied old sage Jina. ⁹ All that I have eaten, done or offered in sacrifice under the influence of ego have gone for nothing. The absence of ego is the real good. ¹⁰ So long, O brahmin, as there is ego, he is subject to sorrow at his difficulties. If he is devoid of it, he becomes happy. Hence it is better to be without it. ¹¹ I am free from anxiety, O sage, ever since I have come to know the impermanence of all enjoyments, gave up my sense of egoism, and attained tranquility of my mind.

Chapter 16 — The Inability to Control the Mind

²⁰ As a child is seized when his imagination thinks he sees a demon, so I find myself in the grasp of my wicked mind, representing falsities as true. ²¹ It is hard to repress the mind, which is hotter than fire, more inaccessible than a hill, and stronger than a thunderbolt. ²² The mind is attracted to its objects like a bird to its prey. It has not even a moment's respite, like a boy and his play. ²³ My mind resembles the sea both in its dullness and its restlessness, and in its extent and fullness with whirlpools and dragons that keep me from advancing.

²⁴ It is more difficult to subdue the mind than to drink the ocean or upset Sumeru Mountain. It is harder than the hardest thing. ²⁵ The mind is the cause of all exertions, and the source of all that senses the three worlds. Its weakness weakens all worldliness, and requires to be cured with care.

²⁶ Our pains and pleasures arise by the hundreds from the mind, like woods growing in groups upon a hill, but no sooner is the scythe of reason applied to them, than they fall off one by one. ²⁷ I am ready to subdue my mind, my greatest enemy in this world, for the purpose of mastering all the virtues, which the learned say depend upon it. My lack of desires has made me adverse to wealth and the gross pleasures it yields, which are like the tints of clouds tainting the moon.

Chapter 17 — Rama on Greed

¹¹ I am so greatly burnt by the flame of greed that I doubt whether this inflammation may be relieved even by administration of nectar. ¹² Like a heated mare, greed takes me far and farther still from my place, and brings me back to it again and again. Thus it hurries me up and down and to and fro in all directions forever.

is like a poisonous plant growing in the wide wilderness of the world, bearing old age and infirmity as its flowers, and producing our troubles as its fruits.²⁵ Our churlishness resembles an aged actress who attempts a manly feat she has not the strength to perform, yet keeps up the dance without pleasing anybody.

⁴⁴ As fish in a pond fondly grasp bait in expectation of a morsel, so the avaricious lay hold on anything, be it wood or stone or even a bit of straw.⁴⁵ Greed like an acute pain excites even the gravest of men to motion, just like the sunshine raises lotus blossoms above water.⁴⁶ It is comparable to bamboo in its length, hollowness, hard knots, and thorny prickles, and yet it is entertained with hopes that it might yield manna and pearls.

⁵⁰ Penury has the power of demeaning, in a moment, the best of men to the baseness of straw in spite of their wisdom, heroism and gravity in other respects. ⁵¹ Greed is like the great valley of the Vindhya Hills, beset with deserts and impenetrable forests, terrible and full of traps laid by the hunters, filled with dust and mist. ⁵² One single greed has everything in the world for its object, and though seated in the breast, it is imperceptible to all. It is like the undulating Milky Ocean in this fluctuating world, sweeping all things yet regaling mankind with its odorous waves.

Chapter 18 — Denunciation of the Body

³ The skeptic is doubtful of its inertness and exercise of intellect, and unreasonable and ignorant people are ever subject to error and illusion. ⁴ The body is as easily gratified with a little as it is exhausted in an instant. Hence there is nothing so pitiable, abject and worthless as our bodies.

⁸ This shady tree of the body is only the temporary resort of a passing soul, whether it be related or unrelated to anybody, or whether reliable or not. ⁹ What man is there, O venerable fathers, who would stoop to reflect that each body is repeatedly assumed only to serve as a boat to pass over the sea of the world? ¹⁰ Who can rely on his body with any confidence, a body like a forest full of holes abounding in hairs that resemble trees? ¹¹ The body composed of flesh, nerves and bones resembles a drum without any musical sound, yet I sit watching it like a cat. ¹² Our bodies are like trees growing in the forest of the world, bearing the flowers of anxiety and perforated by the worms of sorrow and misery, ridden by the apish mind. ¹³ The body with its smiling face appears like a good plant bearing both good and bad fruit, but it has become home for the snake of greed and the crows of anger. ¹⁴ Our arms are like the branches of trees, and our open palms like beautiful clusters of flowers. The other limbs are like twigs and leaves continually shaken by the breath of life. ¹⁵ The two legs are the erect stems and the organs are the seats of the birds of sense. Its youthful bloom is a shade for the passing traveler of love.

body with its bed of pleasure on one side, and its childlike cries of pain on the other, and where our evil desires work like its shouting handmaids.

²⁸ This house of the body is walled about by all its members, and beset by hairs growing on it like ears of grain. It has an empty space of the belly within which I do not like. ²⁹ This body with its nails as those of spiders, and its entrails growling within like barking dogs, and the internal winds emitting fearful sounds, is never delightful to me. ³⁰ What is this body but a passage for the ceaseless inhaling and breathing out of the vital air? Its eyes are like two windows continually opened and closed by the eyelids. I do not like a mansion such as this. ³¹ This mansion of the body, with its formidable door of the mouth and ever-moving bolt of the tongue and bars of the teeth, is not pleasant to me.

³⁸ Tell me, O sage, what is charming in this body that is only a composition of flesh and blood both within and without and frail in its nature? ³⁹ The body does not follow the soul upon death. Tell me sage, what regard should the learned have for such an ungrateful thing as this? ⁴⁰ It is as unsteady as the ears of an enraged elephant, and as fickle as drops of water that trickle on their tips. I should like therefore to abandon it before it comes to abandon me.

⁴¹ It is as tremulous as the leaves of a tree shaken by a breeze, and oppressed by diseases and fluctuations of pleasure and pain. I have no relish in its pungency and bitterness. ⁴² With all its food and drink for evermore, it is as tender as a leaflet and it is reduced to leanness in spite of all our cares, and runs fast towards its dissolution. ⁴³ It is repeatedly subjected to pleasure and pain, and to the succession of affluence and destitution, without being ashamed of itself as the shameless vulgar herd. ⁴⁴ Why nourish this body any longer when, after its enjoyment of prosperity and exercise of authority for a length of time, it acquires no excellence nor durability?

⁵⁴ Those mistaken men who have a high sense of honor and fear dishonor, but who take pleasure in the excess of their gains, are truly killers of both of their bodies and souls. ⁵⁵ We are deceived by the delusion of ego, which like a female evil spirit lies hidden within the cavity of the body with all her sorcery. ⁵⁶ Unaided, our reason is kept in bondage by the malicious fiend of false knowledge, like a slave within the prison of our bodies. ⁵⁷ It is certain that whatever we see here is unreal, and yet it is a wonder that the mass of men are led to deception by the vile body, which has injured the cause of the soul.

⁶² In its instability and ability to perish, the body has outdone all other things that are doomed to destruction. It is moreover subject to very many evils. Therefore I value it as nothing, like straw, and thereby I have obtained my rest.

Chapter 19 — Blemishes of Boyhood

¹ One receiving his birth in the unstable ocean of this world, disturbed by the waves of the turmoil of business, has to pass his boyhood in sufferings only.

⁸ Children are liable to very many errors in their plays and wicked frolics, and in all their wishes and attempts beyond their capacities. Therefore, boyhood is the most dangerous stage of life.

¹² How can boyhood appear pleasing to anyone when the mind swings like a cradle towards every object of desire, however wrong it is deemed to be in both worlds? ¹³ The minds of all living beings are ever restless, but those of young people are ten times more at unrest. ¹⁴ The mind is naturally unsteady, and so is boyhood. Say what can save us from that state of life when both these vagrant things combine to our destruction? ¹⁵ The glances of women, the flashes of lightning, the flame of fire, and the ever-rolling waves have all imitated the fickleness of boyhood.

boy is as much irritated by the eagerness of his whimsical desires as a patch of ground in the desert is parched by the summer heat.

The boy, having passed his state of blemishes, gladly steps into youth with hopes of gaining his objects that tend only to his ruin. ² At this time the unconscious youth feels the wanton inclinations of his loose mind and goes on falling from one tribulation to another. ³ He is overcome like one subdued by the power of delusive Kama Deva (Goddess Desire) lying hidden in the cavity of the heart. ⁴ His ungoverned mind gives rise to loose thoughts like those of voluptuous women, and these serve to beguile him like magic black collyrium eye-liner in the hands of children. ⁵ Vices of the most heinous kind overcome persons of such minds in their youth and lead them to their ruin.

³⁶ As youth advances to its highest pitch, so the feverish passions wax stronger for our destruction only. ³⁷ As long as the night (delusion) of youth lasts, the fiends of our passion rage in the desert of the body. ³⁸ Pity me, O sage, in this state of youth which is so full of agitation as to have deprived me of the sight of reason. O pity me as you would for your dying son. ³⁹ A foolish man who ignorantly rejoices at his transient youth is considered to be like a human beast. ⁴⁰ A foolish fellow who is fond of his youth, flushed with pride and filled with errors, soon comes to repent.

What beauty is there in the body of a woman composed of nerves, bones and joints? She is a mere statue of flesh and a frame of moving machinery with her ribs and limbs. ² Separated from its flesh, skin, blood and water, can you find anything beautiful in the female form that is worth beholding? Then why dote upon it? ³ This fairy frame consisting of hair and blood cannot engage the attention of a high-minded man to its blemishes. ⁴ The bodies of females, so covered with clothing and repeatedly smeared with paints and perfumes, are (in the end) devoured by carnivorous (beasts and worms).

⁷ There is no difference between a woman and a young elephant that lives in the jungle. Both are made of blood, flesh and bones. Then why hunt after her? ⁸ A woman is charming only for a short time. I look upon her merely as a cause of delusion. ⁹ There is no difference between wine and a woman. Both tend equally to produce high-flown mirth and jollity, creating revelry and lust. ¹⁰ Overindulgent men are like chained elephants among mankind. They will never come to sense however goaded by the hooks of reason.

¹¹ Women are the flames of vice. Their black-dyed eye and hair are their smoke and soot. Though pleasing to the sight, they are as intangible as fire. They burn a man like fire consumes straw.

³⁶ I am not content, O brahmin! with these unmanageable enjoyments which are as flickering as the wings of bees, and are as soon at an end as they are born. From my fear of repeated births, decay and death, I long only for the state of supreme bliss.

Chapter 22 — Denunciation of Old Age

⁷ Appetite, the constant companion of my youth, is thriving along with my age, accompanied with her evils of indigence, and heart-burning cares and restlessness.

⁸ Ah me! What must I do to remove my present and future pains? This fear increases with old age and finds no remedy. ⁹ What am I that I am brought to this extremity of senselessness? What can I do in this state? I must remain dumb and silent. Given these reflections, there is an increased sense of helplessness in old age.

pumpkin seasoned with the salt of old age, and devours it with zest.

³⁶ The extinction of being is preceded by old age. Therefore I as a man of little understanding can have no reliance in old age (though extolled by some.) ³⁷ What then is the good of this miserable life, which lives subject to old age? Senility is irresistible in this world, and it defies all efforts to avoid or overcome it.

Chapter 23 — The Vicissitudes of Time

¹⁹ Time is prompted by his rapacity to appropriate everything for himself, from the meanest straw, dust, leaves and worms, to the greatest Indra and Mount Meru itself.

²² Upon the end of a kalpa age, time will dance about with the bones of the dead hanging like a long chain from his neck to the feet. ²³ At the end of a kalpa age, the gale of desolation rising from the body of this world destroyer causes the fragments of Mount Meru to fly about in the air like the rinds of the bhoja-petera tree. ²⁴ Time then assumes his terrific form of fire to dissolve the world in empty space, and the gods Brahma and Indra and all others cease to exist. ²⁵ As the sea shows himself in a continued series of waves rising and falling one after another, so it is time that creates and dissolves the world, and appears to rise and fall with the rotation of days and nights. ²⁶ At end of the world, time plucks the gods and demigods from their great tree of existence like ripe fruit.

³⁰ Time assumes to himself various colors of black, white and red (at night, day and midday) which serve for his vestures.

³¹ As the earth supports the great hills that are fixed upon it, so time supports all the innumerable ponderous worlds that constitute the universe. ³² Hundreds of great kalpa ages may pass away, yet there is nothing that can move eternity to pity or concern, or stop or expedite his course. It neither sets nor rises. ³³ Time is never proud to think that it is he who, without the least sense of pain or labor, brings this world into play and makes it exist.

³⁴ Time is like a reservoir in which the nights are mud, the days lotuses, and the clouds bees.

rest and respite, time reappears as the creator, preserver, and destroyer of all who remembers all. He shows the shapes of all things whether good or bad, keeping his own nature beyond the knowledge of all. Thus does time expand and preserve and finally dissolve all things by way of sport.

Time is a self-willed sportsman, like a prince, who is inaccessible to dangers and whose powers are unlimited. ² This world is like a forest and a sporting ground of time where the poor deluded worldlings are caught in his snare like bodies of wounded stags.

⁹ The restless bow of death is found flinging its sorrowful arrows with ceaseless thunder claps on all sides. ¹⁰ This world is like a forest in which sorrows range about like playful apes, and time like a sportive prince in this forest, is now wandering, now walking, now playing and now killing his game.

Chapter 25 — The Play of Death

¹⁹ She has filled the sky with the emaciated skeleton of her body and her terrible, destructive figure.

²⁰ The various shapes of skulls of the dead adorn her body like a beautiful garland of lotuses. They sway to and fro during her dance at the end of a kalpa age.

upper loop of his right ear, and Mount Meru as a golden ring in his left. ²⁴ Under their lobes are suspended the moon and the sun, like pendant earrings glittering over his cheeks. The mountain ranges called the Lokaloka are fastened like chains around his waist.

Such being the all destructive conduct of time and others, what confidence, O great sage, can men like me have in them? ² We all remain here, as slaves sold to Fate and Destiny, and we are deceived by their allurements as beasts of the forest.

¹¹ Our very senses are our enemies, before which even truth appears as falsehood. The mind is the enemy of the mind and self is the enemy of self. ¹² Self-esteem is stained, intelligence is blamed for its deception, our actions are attended with bad results, and our pleasures tend only to effeminacy. ¹³ All our desires are directed to enjoyments. Our love of truth is lost, our women are the symbols of vice, and all that was once so sweet has become tasteless and vapid. ¹⁴ Things that are not real are believed as real. They have become the cause of our pride by hardening us in untruth and keeping us from the light of truth.

¹⁵ My mind is at a loss to think what to do. It regrets its increased appetite for pleasure, and for its lack of self-denial. ¹⁶ My sight is dimmed by the dust of sensuality. The darkness of self-esteem prevails over me. I am never able to reach purity of mind, and truth is far away from me. ¹⁷ Life has become uncertain and death is always advancing near. My patience is disturbed, and there is an increased appetite for whatever is false.

²¹ Patience is converted into impatience. Man is subject to the states of birth and death. Good company is rare, but bad company is always within everyone's reach.

²³ What reliance can there be on human life when the points of the compass become indistinct and indiscernible, when countries and places change their positions and names, and when even mountains are liable to be dilapidated? ²⁴ What reliance can there be on man when the heavens are swallowed in infinity, when this world is absorbed in nothingness, and the very earth loses her stability? ²⁵ What reliance can there be on men like ourselves when the very seas are liable to be dried up, when the stars are doomed to fade away and disappear, and when the most perfect of beings are liable to dissolution?

²⁶ What reliance can there be on men like us when even the demigods are liable to destruction, when the polar star is known to change its place, and when the immortal gods are doomed to mortality?

²⁷ What reliance can there be on men like us when Indra is doomed to be defeated by demons, when even Death is hindered from his aim, and when air currents cease to move? ²⁸ What reliance can there be on men like us when the very moon is to vanish with the sky, when the very sun is to be split into pieces, and when fire itself is to become frigid and cold?

²⁹ What reliance can there be on men like us when the very gods Hari and Brahma are to be absorbed into the Great One, and when Shiva himself is to be no more? ³⁰ What reliance can there be on men like us when the duration of time comes to be counted, when Destiny is destined to her final destiny, and when all emptiness loses itself in infinity?

vine growing in the sky. Yet I know not why men of reason would not understand this truth. ⁴³ “This is a day of festivity, a season of joy and a time of procession. Here are our friends. Here are the pleasures and here are a variety of our entertainments.” Thus do men of vacant minds amuse themselves with weaving the web of their desires, until they become extinct.

O sage! This seemingly pleasing but actually unpleasant world has nothing in it that produces anything that can afford tranquility to the soul. ² After playful boyhood is over, the mind wastes itself in the society of women like a deer fallen into a pit, then the body bends down under old age, and man has only to grieve. ³ As the body is stricken with the frost of old age, its beauty flies away like the bloom of a fading lotus flower, and then the fountain of man's worldliness dries up. ⁴ As the body declines, death rejoices. The body grows lean with grey hairs upon the head, just as a vine fades away with flowers upon it.

²⁹ The tree ordained to be useful to mankind by the loads of flowers and fruit that it produces, in the end is also fated to be hewn down by a cruel axe. How then can good men expect to avoid the cruel hand of death?

³⁰ Society with relatives is as dangerous as a poisonous plant. It is pleasant for its domestic affections, which in reality are only delusions of the soul. ³¹ What is there in the world without fault in it? What is there that does not afflict or grieve us? What is born that is not subject to death? What acts are free from deceit?

³² Those living for one kalpa aeon are reckoned short-lived as compared with those living for many kalpa aeons, and they again are short-lived compared to Brahma. Hence all the parts of time are finite and the ideas of length or shortness are all false.

³³ Things called mountains are made of rocks, those called trees are made of wood, and those made of flesh are called animals, and man is the best of them. But they are all made of matter and doomed to death and decay. ³⁴ Many things appear to be endowed with intelligence, and the heavenly bodies seem to be full of water. But physicists have found out by analysis that everything is made up of minute matter. ³⁵ No wonder that all this should appear miraculous to the mind because even men's dreams appear so very fascinating to them.

shade to the use of nobody. ³⁹ Men are found to resemble black antelopes in their wanderings. Some of them wander about the sweet, soft and beautiful sceneries of the country. Others roam in sterile tracts and boundless forests.

⁴⁰ The diverse daily acts of nature are all inherently pernicious. For a time they appear pleasant and ravishing to the heart, but they are attended with pain in the end, and they fill the mind of the wise with dismay. ⁴¹ Man is addicted to greed and is prone to a variety of wicked shifts and plots. Now a good man cannot be found even in a dream. There is no act which is free from difficulty. I know not how to pass this state of human life.

Whatever we see in the world, living or inert, are all as impermanent as things seen in a dream. ² The hollow desert that appears as the dried bed of a sea today will be found tomorrow to be a running flood from the accumulation of rainwater. ³ What today is a mountain reaching the sky covered with extensive forests is in course of time leveled to the ground, and afterwards is dug into a pit. ⁴ The body that today is clothed with garments of silk, decorated with garlands and fragrance, tomorrow is to be cast away naked into a ditch. ⁵ What is seen to be a city today, busy with the bustle of various occupations, passes in the course of a few days into the condition of an uninhabited wilderness. ⁶ The man who is very powerful today and presides over principalities, in a few days is reduced to a heap of ashes.

¹⁷ The days of great men, their glories and deeds, are retained only in our memories and in a short time, such must be with us also. ¹⁸ Many things are decaying and renewing day by day. In this ever-changing world there is no end to this accursed course of events. ¹⁹ Men degenerate into lower animals, and those again rise to humanity. Gods become no-gods. There is nothing that remains the same.

³² One that was something else before is born as a man in this life, then is changed to another state in course of a few days. Thus there is no being that remains steadily in the same state. ³³ A pot is made of clay, and cloth is made of cotton, and they are still the same dull materials of which they are composed. Thus there is nothing new in this world that was not seen or known before. There is nothing that does not change its form. ³⁴ The acts of creation and destruction, of diffusion, production and preservation follow one another like the revolutions of day and night appear to man.

⁴² Time is a skilful player and plays many parts with ease. But he is chiefly skilled in tragedy and he often plays his tragic part in the affairs of men. ⁴³ All beings, according to their past good and bad deeds, are produced like fruit in the great forest of the universe. Time like a gust of wind blasts them day by day before their maturity.

Chapter 29 — Unreliability of Worldly Things

⁴ Every day I see honor being eaten up by men arguing with each other, using harsh words as they crack nuts with their teeth.

⁹ What do I have to do with a kingdom and all its enjoyments? Of what avail are riches to me, and what is the end of all our exertions? All these are only the requirements of self-love from which I am entirely free. ¹⁰ The chain of births is a bond that binds all men by its strong knots of the senses. The best of men are those striving to break loose from this bondage for their liberation.

¹⁵ O brahmin, the best of the learned, teach me the art of the mysteries of past and future. Teach me so that I may soon become like one devoid of grief and fear and worldly troubles so that I may have the light of truth beaming upon me.

²⁰ I who am devoid of desires would like to break this ornamental chain of worldliness that hangs about me like a deadly serpent, like a lion tears apart a net.²¹ O most learned sage, scatter the mist that has clouded the forest of my heart. By the light of true knowledge, scatter the darkness that has overcast my mind.²² There are no anxieties, O sage, which cannot be put to an end by the company of good minded men. The darkness of night is dispelled by moonbeams.

²³ Life is as fickle as a drop of water in a mass of clouds blown by the winds. Our enjoyments are as unsteady as lightning flashing in the clouds. The pleasures of youth are as slippery as water. With these reflections in my mind, I have subdued them all under the province of peace and tranquility.

Chapter 30 — Self-Disparagement

²⁰ Tell me how I can have knowledge of past and future events of the world, and the nature of the unsteady works of its Creator. ²¹ Do so, that my mind which is like the moon in the sky of my heart may be cleared of its impurities. ²² Tell me what is most delectable to the mind, and what is the most abominable, and how this fickle and inconstant mind may become fixed like a rock. ²³ Tell me what is that holy charm that can remove this choleric pain of worldliness attended with numberless troubles?

²⁴ Tell me how can I entertain the blossoms of the tree of heavenly happiness within my heart that sheds the coolness of full moonbeams.

²⁵ O you good men who are present here and learned in divine knowledge, teach me so that I may obtain the fullness of my heart and may not come to grief and sorrow anymore. ²⁶ My mind is devoid of that tranquility which results chiefly from holy happiness. My mind is perplexed with endless doubts that disturb my peace like dogs molest smaller animals in the desert.

I have no trust in the durability of life which is as transient as a drop of water on the edge of a shaking leaf on a lofty tree, and as short as the cusp of the moon on Shiva's forehead. ² I have no faith in the durability of life which is transient as the swelling in the pouch of a frog as it croaks in the meadow. Nor do I have any trust in the company of friends which is as dangerous as the treacherous traps of hunters.

¹⁰ Tell me, O sage, how the mist of our desires, which darkens the moon of our intellects, is to be dispelled from our minds to make it shine forth in its full brightness. ¹¹ How are we to deal with this wilderness of the world, knowing well that it is destructive both of our present and future interests?

¹³ Tell me, O best of sages, how one who has fallen into the furnace of this earth may escape unburned like mercury. ¹⁴ How can one be rid of the world when it is impossible for him to avoid dealing with it, in the same manner as it is impossible for aquatic animals to live without their native element?

myself. I will cease from all my actions of bathing and making my offerings, as also from my diet and the like. ²³ I will attend to no duty, nor care about prosperity or calamity. I will be free from all desires except that of the abandonment of this body. ²⁴ I must remain aloof from all fears, sympathies, selfish feelings and emulation, and continue to sit quietly as a figure in painting. ²⁵ I will gradually do away with the inspiration and respiration of my breath and outward sensations until I part with this trifle, the seat all of troubles, this the so called body.

²⁶ I do not belong to this body, nor does it belong to me, nor is anything else mine. I shall be null and void like a lamp without oil and abandon everything to do with this body.

²⁷ Valmiki said:—

Then Rama, who was as lovely as the moon and whose mind was well filled with reasoning, became silent before the assemblage of eminent men, like a peacock, in awe, ceases his screaming before gathering clouds.

When Prince Rama concluded his speech, calculated to remove all ignorance from the mind, ² all men in the assembly had their eyes beaming with wonder. The hairs on their bodies stood erect and pierced through their garments as if wishing to hear the speech. ³ For a moment, after their stoic detachment and in their eagerness, the assembly seemed to have lost their worldly desires and be rolling in a sea of nectar. ⁴ The audience remained motionless, like figures in a painting, enraptured with internal delight having heard the sweet words of fortunate Rama.

as spiritual masters (siddhas) from the beginning of creation, but nowhere have we ever heard any speech as sweet as this.²⁵ Even the gods such as ourselves have never heard such a magnanimous speech of detachment as Rama, the moon of Raghu's race, has just now spoken.²⁶ We account ourselves truly blessed to have heard today this highly charming and wonderful speech from the mouth of Rama himself.²⁷ Indeed we are awakened and edified by attending diligently to Rama's truly excellent speech on the ambrosial bliss of asceticism, and leading to the highest joy of men.”

Chapter 33 — Association of Celestial & Earthly Beings

So saying, the whole company of divine sages left their celestial abode for that court. ⁵ There Narada, the chief of sages, sat foremost playing on his lute. In the midst was Vyasa with his dark blue complexion resembling a rainy cloud. ⁶ Moreover, the court was adorned with the presences of the chief sages Bhrgu, Angiras, Pulastya and others, with Chyavana, Uddalaka, Usira, Saraloman and many more with them.

¹³ On seeing the body of masters descending from the sky to the earth, the entire court of King Dasharata rose up to greet them. ¹⁴ There was a mixed assemblage of the celestial and earthly sages, whose commingled glory spread a luster to the ten sides of the court.

²³ Seated in that assembly were the sages Vishwamitra, Vasishtha, Vama Deva and the ministers of state. ²⁴ Also there were Narada, the son of Brahma, Vyasa, the greatest of sages, Marichi, Durvasa and Angira. ²⁵ Kratu, Pulastya, Pulaha, Saraloma, the great sage Vatsayana, Bharadwaja, and Valmiki the great bard and sage, were all there, ²⁶ as were Uddalaka, Richika, Sarjati as well as Chyavana. ²⁷ These and many others versed in the various branches of the Vedas, knowing all things worth knowing, were the leading members of that assembly.

BOOK II
The Aspirant Who Longs for Liberation
(Mumukshu Khanda)

This section deals with the preparations required of the person who seeks God and the moral and mental qualities necessary to qualify for the spiritual path. Vasishta states that peace of mind (shanti), contentment (santosha), keeping the company of realized sages (satsanga), and inquiry into the nature of the soul (vichara) are the four sentinels that guard the gates to moksha, or liberation. The belief that one is confined by fate is severely condemned and the person who seeks spiritual development is urged to rely on personal efforts for progress on the spiritual path.

The person should not shun action but should learn to be indifferent to its fruits. One should not be affected by the pleasures and pains that are the inevitable accompaniment of action. The person is advised to keep the company of saints and to study the scriptures (shastras), particularly those dealing with self knowledge (atma vidya).

Chapter 1 — The Liberation of Shukadeva: His Need for Confirmation

⁶ Vishwamitra answered, “Hear me relate to you, Rama, the story of Shukadeva, whose case was exactly like yours. The narration of this story prevents future births.”

Vishwamitra speaking:—

⁹ Like you, he reflected in his mind on the vanity of worldly affairs and became equally indifferent to all its concerns. ¹⁰ It was then that this great minded youth was led by his own discriminative understanding to a long inquiry after what was true, which he found at last by his own investigation.

¹⁵ Sage Vyasa, who knew the nature of the soul, being asked this by his son, explained to him clearly all that was to be said. ¹⁶ Shuka thought that he already knew all this by his good understanding and therefore did not think much of his father’s instructions. ¹⁷ Vyasa, understanding the thoughts of his son, replied that he himself knew no better than his son about the true nature of these things, ¹⁸ but there was a king in this land named Janaka who well knew the knowledge of the knowable, and from whom Shuka could learn everything.

an abundance of food, perfumes and lusty maidens.²⁵ But neither those vexations nor these entertainments could affect the tenor of Shuka's mind, which remained firm as a rock against the blasts of wind.²⁶ He remained there like the full moon, tranquil in his desires, silent and contented in his mind.

²⁷ King Janaka, having come to know the disposition of Shuka's mind, had him brought to his presence, where seeing the complacency of his soul, he rose up and bowed down to him.²⁸ Janaka said, "You have accomplished to the full all your duties in this world, and you have obtained the object of your heart's desire to its utmost extent. What do you now desire for which you are welcome from me?"

²⁹ Shuka said, "Tell me, my guide, what is the source of all this bustle (of worldly life), and tell me also how it may soon subside."

³⁰ Vishwamitra said:—

Being thus asked by Shuka, Janaka told him the same things that he had learned from the great soul that is his father.³¹ Shuka then said, "All this I have come to know long before by my own intuition, and then from the speech of my father in answer to my question.³² You sage, who are the most eloquent of all, have spoken to the same effect, and the same is found to be the true meaning of the scriptures.³³ That the world is a creation of will and loses itself with the absence of our desires, and that it is an accursed and unsubstantial world after all, are the conclusions arrived at by all sages."

³⁴ "Now tell me truly, O long armed prince, so that you may set my mind may be set at rest from its wandering all about the world. What do you think this world to be?"

³⁵ Janaka replied, "There is nothing more certain, O sage, than what you know by yourself and have heard from your father.³⁶ There is but one undivided intelligent spirit known as the Universal Soul and nothing else. It becomes confined by its desires (mental conditioning) and becomes freed by its lack of them."

³⁹ "Even your father, with all his learning in every science and his devotion to austerities, has not arrived to the state of perfection like you.⁴⁰ I am a student of Vyasa and you are his son, but by your abandonment of the taste for the enjoyments of life, you are greater than both of us.⁴¹ You have obtained whatever is obtainable by the comprehension of your mind. You take no interest in the outer and visible world, so you are liberated from it and have nothing to doubt."

rebirth by abstention from earthly desires, the great soul Shuka sank into the holy state of the Supreme Spirit (nirvikalpa samadhi), just like a drop of water mixes with the waters or merges into the depth of the ocean.

Rama, now it is appropriate that you have your mind properly purified from its doubts, as it was done with Shuka, the son of Vyasa.

² You see, O great sages, how perfectly the knowable is known to Rama, whose good understanding has learnt to feel a distaste for worldly enjoyments as if they were diseases to him. ³ You well know that the fixed principle in the mind of one knowing the knowable is to have an aversion to all the enjoyments of life. ⁴ The desire of results chains a man to the earth. Knowledge of the frailties here serves to dispel his darkness.

¹³ Let the venerable Vasishtha reason with the high minded Rama and restore the peace of his mind, ¹⁴ for he is the master and family teacher for the whole race of the Raghus. Besides, he is all knowing and all seeing with a clear insight of the three times.

Sage, you well remember the instruction given us of old for pacifying our mutual enmity and promoting the welfare of the high minded sages, ¹⁶ when our lord the lotus-born Brahma, seated on the tableland of Nishadha Mountain and shaded by sarala trees, delivered his wise lectures to us and the sages. ¹⁷ Through that knowledge of liberation, our worldly desires are dispelled like the darkness of night by sunbeams. ¹⁸ Now please, O brahmin, communicate that rational knowledge of the knowable to your student Rama, whereby he may gain the peace of his mind.

Chapter 3 — Repeated Creations of the World; Repeated Incarnations of the Same Personality

¹ Vasishta said, “Rama, I will now expound to you the knowledge that was imparted of old by the lotus-born (Brahma) for the peace of mankind after he created the world.”

² Rama said, “Sage, I know that you will expound to me the subject of liberation in full length, but first remove my false ideas about the frailty of this world. ³ How was it that the great sage Vyasa, the father and guide of Shuka, with all his omniscience, did not attain disembodied emancipation when his son did?”

⁴ Vasishta said, “There is no counting the atoms that proceed from the spirit and form the three worlds both before and after the birth of the glorious sun. ⁵ There is nobody who can even count the millions of orbs that form the three worlds. ⁶ Nor can anyone calculate what numbers of creation will rise from the ocean of divine existence like endless waves.”

⁷ Rama said, “It is needless to talk of worlds gone by or yet to come. Speak of the present.”

⁸ Vasishta said:—

This world consists of brute, human and heavenly beings whose lives, when they are said to perish in any part of it, really exist in the same part.

⁹ The mind is described as ever-fluctuating. In itself, it gives rise to everything in the three worlds. It resides in a void in the form of the heart, and the Uncreated also resides in the empty space of the soul (giving the mind the power to realize the latent ideas of the soul).

It is at the point of death and afterwards that the unreality of the world best appears. ¹⁴ But this knowledge (of the unreality of the world) becomes darkened upon being reborn on earth, when the shadow of this world again falls on the mirror of his sentient soul. ¹⁵ Thus there is a struggle for repeated births and deaths here, and a fancy for the next world after death. ¹⁶ After he shuffles off his body, he assumes another and then another form, and thus the world is as unstable as a stool made of plantain leaves and its coatings.

²³ There will be born again other Vyasas and Valmikis, and likewise some other Bhrigus and Angiras, as well as other Pulastyas and others in different forms. ²⁴ All other men, asuras and gods with all their hosts are repeatedly born and destroyed either in their former or different shapes.

²⁵ Like this there are seventy-two treta cycles in a kalpa age of Brahma, some of which have passed by and others to follow. Thus will there be other people like those who have gone by and, as I understand, another Rama and Vasishtha like ourselves. ²⁶ There have been ten successive incarnations of this Vyasa who has done such wonderful deeds and is famed for his vast knowledge. ²⁷ Myself and Valmiki have been contemporaries many a time, born in different ages and very many times. ²⁸ We have been together many times, and there were others also like myself, and so was I also born in many forms (in many ages).

²⁹ This Vyasa will be born again eight times hereafter, and he will again write his Mahabharata and the Purana histories. ³⁰ He will finally attain liberation from the body after he has divided the Vedas, described the acts of Bharata's race (in the Mahabharata), and established the knowledge of Brahman (in the Vedanta). ³¹ This Vyasa who is devoid of fear and sorrow, and who has become tranquil and emancipate in himself after subduing his mind and discarding the worldly desires, is said to be liberated even in his present lifetime.

³² Those liberated in life may sometimes associate with relatives and estates, his acts and duties, his knowledge and wisdom, and all his exertions, like those of any other men, or he may forsake them all at once. ³³ These beings are either reborn a hundred times in some age or never at all (as in the case of divine incarnations), depending on the inscrutable will (maya, or illusion) of God. ³⁴ Souls undergo such changes by repetition, like a bushel of grain that is collected only to be repeatedly sown, then reaped again and again.

I know, gentle Rama, that liberation of the soul is the same whether in its embodied or disembodied state, just like seawater and its waves are the same liquid substance. ² Liberation, whether of embodied or disembodied spirits, consists in their detachment from the objects of sense. Hence the soul unattached to sensual gratification is liberated, having no idea of objects of the senses.

³ We see before us the living liberated sage (Vyasa) as an embodied person, yet we have no doubt of the detachment of his inner soul from this body. ⁴ The difference between embodied and disembodied souls, when they are equally enlightened and liberated, is like that of the seawater in its calm and billowy states. ⁵ There is no more difference between liberation in the body and without the body than there is between the air in motion and at rest. ⁶ Liberation, whether with or without the body, produces unselfishness. We have lost our selfishness ever since we have come to the knowledge of an undivided unity.

⁷ Therefore attend to the true doctrine that I am going to deliver to you, which will be a jewel to your ears as it will dispel the darkness of ignorance. ⁸ Know, O son of Raghu, that everything in this world is obtainable by our efforts being properly employed.

⁹ This knowledge — that there is no other way to gain results except but by our efforts — rises like the moon in the human mind and sheds its cooling and delightful influence to the heart. ¹⁰ It will become evident that we see the results of our efforts, and that nothing comes from what the dull and mistaken call chance or fate.

¹¹ An effort, when directed according to the counsel and conduct of the good in the exercise of the action of the body and mind, is attended with success. Otherwise it is as vain as the freak of a madman. ¹² Thus he who hopes to acquire riches and perseveres in its acquisition surely succeeds in gaining them, or else he stops short midway.

¹⁷ Know our actions to be of two kinds, namely those of former and present lives. Know that the acts of the present life generally supersede those of the past.

²⁰ A man laid up in a state of disability is unable to twist his figure to hold a little water in the hollow of his palm to drink. Meanwhile there is another who (by his well-directed efforts) gets possession of seas, islands, mountains and cities for himself, supports all his dependents and relations, and does not think this earth too great for him.

Will or inclination, even according to the rules of law and scriptures, is the prime instrument of all action, just as the reflection of light gives various colors to things. ² If someone uses unlawful acts to attain something that he desires, it becomes as fruitless as the efforts of a madman.

²³ But people do not even try to make an effort. They think that effort would be endless, and no amount of effort could make a gem come out of a stone. ²⁴ Know that like all things, there is a limit to both human fate and effort, just like a pot or a picture has a (finite capacity and length). ²⁵ It is by means of good conduct derived from best precepts and the company of the good that one succeeds to his object. A disposition that breaks loose of these is sure to fall to the contrary, to ruin.

²⁹ It has been seen, known, heard and experienced that acts are rewarded with success. They are dull-headed who think of obtaining it through fate or luck. ³⁰ If there were no folly of idleness in this world, what man would fail either to be rich or learned? It is because of idleness that this earth is filled to its utmost limit of the sea with indigent and beastly men. ³¹ After passing his childhood and getting rid of its false and idle playfulness, and when he has attained the age of youthful vigor, let a man apply himself diligently to the company of wise men, and to the cultivation of his understanding by a knowledge of the scriptures and their meanings, and by scanning well his own faults and qualities.

³² Valmiki said:—

After sage Vasishta had said all this, the day passed away, and after taking leave of the assembly the sages went to bathe. With the rising beams of the sun dispelling the gloom of night, they joined again.

Chapter 6 — Fate Is the Result of Former Efforts

Fate is nothing but the result of our actions in former existences. Therefore it is possible to leave it at a distance and extricate oneself by keeping good company and studying moral scriptures. ² Whatever one attempts to do, he readily meets with its reward. This is the effect of effort. Fate is nothing but the same thing. ³ Men laboring hard are heard to exclaim, “O how painful it is!” Men suffering under fate cry out, “O hard is fate!” ⁴ Thus fate, being nothing but a name for our past actions, it is as easily overcome (by present acts) as a boy (is subdued) by an adult youth. ⁵ As some bad conduct of yesterday is corrected by proper behavior of the present day, so is past fate is removed by present acts.

¹⁶ In the case of the a beggar boy who is installed into the position of ruling and protecting the people of a kingdom, it is the unanimous concurrence of the law and ministers and of the elephant and of citizens (that is to be taken as the chief cause). ¹⁷ Should it be only the royal elephant who elects the beggar boy, then in that case it would be attributed to the boy’s good fortune only.

²³ All our acts are subject to their proper time and place, and to the modes of their operation and combination according to the course of nature. That is why the more diligent are the most successful.

²⁴ Therefore, in order to cross the ocean of this world, we ought to rely upon our efforts and the clarity of our understanding from the help of scriptures and association with the wise.

²⁵ Actions of the past and present lives are the two fruit trees growing in the garden of humanity. Whichever is cultivated the best thrives and bears most fruit. ²⁶ He who is unable to overcome his false fate by his best efforts is no better than an ignorant beast that has no power over its pain or pleasure. ²⁷ He who thinks of going to heaven or hell by the will of the Maker is also a slave to destiny and is no better than a beast. ²⁸ The man of a noble mind who is employed in acts of goodness, breaks off from the errors of the world like a lion from its cage. ²⁹ Those who vainly imagine themselves to be led about by some supernatural power, and so slight their necessary duties, are to be shunned at a distance as the mean and base.

³⁰ There are thousands of acts that are attended with gain or loss to their doers, but it is the duty of man to do what is right whether they be pleasant or painful. ³¹ He who does not transgress the bounds of law and does not forsake his duties is attended by every blessing abundant as the pearls in the sea.

³⁵ The acts of our former lives constitute what we call our fate (daivam) or destiny and they return to us from the region of the gods for our good in both worlds. ³⁶ We blame a fate that is the creation of the fancy of the ignorant, who by their adoration of such passivity meet their own destruction. ³⁷ One benefits himself always by his activity in both worlds, as the good acts of today gives a grace to those of yesterday. ³⁸ Therefore, whoever applies himself with diligence to his acts, reaps their fruit like that of an amalaki in his palm, which though it is within his grasp, yet it could not be obtained without the cost of some labor.

Chapter 7 — On the Necessity of Activity

¹¹ There are threefold benefits derived from the study of books, from the lectures of a teacher, and from one's own industry, all of which attend our efforts and not destiny. ¹² This is the long and short of all the scriptures (shastras), that diligence preserves our minds from all evils by employing them to whatever is good and right. ¹³ To apply with diligence to whatever is excellent, not low or mean and not liable to loss or decay, is the lesson of parents and teachers to their sons and pupils.

¹⁶ We have visible evidence (of the efficacy) of activity every day, in the examples of men travelling in distant countries (for the sake of gain). ¹⁷ He who eats becomes satisfied and who does not starves. So he who walks is said to proceed and not one who rests. In like manner, whoever speaks is called a speaker and not the silent man. Thus action makes the man.

³¹ It was by means of his actions that Vishnu conquered the demons and established the order of the world. It was by this that he created the worlds, none of which could be the work of fate.

What does “destiny” mean? It has no form, no act, no motion or might. It is only a false notion rooted in the (minds) of the ignorant. ² “Destiny” is a word that has come into fashion from the idea of karma, the idea of future retribution for one’s past actions and the like. ³ From this, ignorant are led to believe that there is such a thing as destiny, something incapable of explanation, which has led them to a fallacy much like mistaking a rope for a snake.

⁴ Yesterday’s misdeed is rectified by the following day’s good action. Therefore let this day supersede the past and employ yourself today to action. ⁵ The perverted understanding that believes in destiny is grounded on false conception. One may as well enter fire with the conviction that it will not burn unless it is so destined. ⁶ If destiny is the sole cause of everything, then why should a man take actions of bathing and making his offerings, sitting and walking, all of which may be done by his destiny? ⁷ What then is the need to advise another to do something if destiny is the director of all? Let them all be silent and say nothing to nobody.

¹⁰ Instruments and hands are two things joined together. Each has its separate action, but if the hand is lacking, nothing can be done by destiny. ¹¹ Whether in the mind and intellect of a (learned) pundit or (illiterate) cowherd, there is no such idea of destiny. Hence it is a mere non-entity. ¹² If destiny does not mean agent, it must mean something else. If it is the same thing as agent, why give it a different name (i.e., “destiny”)? If it can be proved to be an imaginary term, why not imagine your effort to be the agent?

¹³ Immaterial destiny, like a void, has no connection with the material body. If it had form or figure it would be visible. Therefore destiny is nonexistent. ¹⁴ If destiny were the mainspring of the movements of all beings in the three worlds, then let all creatures rest at ease (with assurance) that destiny will perform their parts. ¹⁵ The belief that we are guided by destiny and do as we are led to do is a deception and an excuse. In fact, there is no such thing as destiny.

¹⁶ It is a fool who fancies a destiny to himself and relies upon it to his own disadvantage. The intelligent raise themselves to better states by means of their effort. ¹⁷ Say, who is there in this world among the mighty and brave or the intelligent and learned who looks or waits upon destiny? ¹⁸ Destiny may be said good if it had the power of saving a man from being beheaded whom fortune-tellers had pronounced by their calculation to be long lived. ¹⁹ Again, O Raghava, if a fortune-teller predicts that a man will become learned and he does without being taught, then we can believe fortune is true.

on earth. ²³ Look again how the chiefs of the gods have wrested the extensive earth from those demons by their valorous deeds of slaying and harassing them (in battle).

Chapter 9 — Investigation of Acts (Thoughts Are Action; Mind Is Soul)

² Vasishta replied:—

It is a man’s activity and nothing else, O Raghava, that is the cause of all his actions and the recipient of their consequences. Destiny has nothing to do with it. ³ Destiny is a mere imaginary thing that neither exists nor acts nor feels (their effects). It is neither seen nor regarded. ⁴ Destiny refers to the good or bad results that proceed from action. ⁵ People label the wished for and unwished for consequences resulting from the good and bad deeds of human activity as destiny. ⁶ The majority of mankind calls human activity, which is the only cause of some unavoidable future consequence, to be destiny.

¹² Vasishta answered saying:—

Well said, O Rama. You know everything. But hear me tell you the whole of it, whereby you will have a firm belief in the nonexistence of destiny.

¹³ In the end, even all the various desires that men may have entertained in their minds come to be accounted as his deeds. ¹⁴ All animals also act according to their desires, doing nothing for which they have no inclination in their natures. ¹⁵ As a villager goes to his village and a townsman goes to town, so it is the nature of desire to lead men to their particular acts.

²³ Rama said, “Being caught in the net of my pre-existent desire, I remain a captive to them and do as they lead me to. Say then, O sage, what else I can do?”

So then, O Rama, you can reach your lasting good if you exert your efforts for it. There is no other way.

²⁵ Desires are of two kinds: some lead to good and others to evil. Hence the desires of one’s prior state must have been of one kind or the other. ²⁶ If pure desires guide you now, gradually you will be led by means of your good acts to attain the state of your lasting welfare. ²⁷ But if wrong inclinations tend to lead you to difficulties, of necessity you must try your best to overcome such propensities.

²⁸ Rama, you are wise, perfectly intelligent, and composed of more than just a dull body. Now if you need another’s guidance to waken your intellect, then when is your own intelligence? ²⁹ If you would have someone else enlighten your understanding, then who was the other who illuminated him, and who is the other to illuminate that person also? Therefore, because no one is wholly devoid of understanding, let him improve it himself.

But because the human mind is like a child, it must not be forced. ³³ The training of a child is like that of the mind. It is done slowly by gentleness and indulgence, and not by force or hurry.

³⁴ You have already mastered all your good and bad desires by your constant practice. From now on, you have to direct your tendencies to good only. ³⁵ O victorious Rama, when by your pristine habits you have an aptitude to do good, know that it is the result of your good nature. ³⁶ O sinless Rama, at present your desires are lying dormant in your mind. They require some practice to be employed only to the doing of good. ³⁷ If you will not exert yourself now to improve your dormant desires by constant practice, you can never expect to be happy. ³⁸ When doubtful, incline towards what is good, and as you thrive on this you shall have no evil to fear.

³⁹ Whatever one practices, with time he will become perfect, just like studying from childhood makes the learned free from error. ⁴⁰ When you have good will inside, you must accomplish your purpose by means of your activity and your subjection of the organs of your body. ⁴¹ So long as your mind is imperfect and unacquainted with the state of divine truth, you must attend to your teacher, books and reasoning and act according to their directions. ⁴² Having first finished your acts and known the truth, you must abandon even your meritorious deeds, and all your desires with them.

⁴³ Having known by your good understanding that the virtuous course led by honorable men is truly good, give particular attention to know the nature of God, then forsake even that and remain as silent as an ancient sage (muni).

This thing called destiny is as true as the reality of God. It is the cause of causes and effect of effects.

² Now attend to my words, depend on your efforts, and intently apply your ever confident mind to the attainment of your chief good. ³ Use your effort to control your misleading senses from pursuing their objects.

⁴ I will now set out a system for you that contains the essence of the best means for liberation, and which will confer the fruits of your exertions and lead you to your welfare in both worlds. ⁵ Let those who have great minds forsake their worldly desires in order to avoid future births and attend to these lectures with calm contentment. ⁶ Weigh well the meanings of previous discussions and those to come, repress your mind from its worldly cares, and compose yourself in calmness in order to inquire after truth. ⁷ Hear me relate to you, Rama, the way to emancipation which will remove your feelings of pain and pleasure, and which will become the surest means to lead you to supreme happiness. ⁸ On hearing this lecture on liberation in the company of all those reasonable men, you will know that highest state which is free from pain, and of which there is no end. ⁹ This was spoken of old in a former kalpa age by Brahma abiding in the Supreme Spirit. It is the remover of all anxiety and giver of all comfort to the soul.

¹⁰ Rama asked, “Say, O brahmin who is my guide, what cause moved Brahma himself to reveal this knowledge of old, and how did you obtain it?”

The Supreme Soul of infinite manifestations exists by itself. It passes through and supports the whole in the form of void and understanding and as light to all living beings. ¹² From Him who remains the same (unaltered being) in his rest and motion, the great Vishnu was born, like a moving wave on the quiet waters of the sea. ¹³ Then Brahma was produced from the lotus of his heart, having Mount Meru for its seed, the points of the compass for its petals, and the stars for its pistils.

¹⁴ He, being beset by gods and sages acquainted with the Vedas and their meanings, created all the worlds and all minds with their various thoughts. ¹⁵ Then he created groups of men in the Bharata division (India) and in a corner of Jambudwipa (Asia) and subjected them to all manner of diseases and afflictions. ¹⁶ They are also troubled by the possession and desire of many things and their subjection to dangers and diseases. Here all species of created beings are subject to a variety of tribulations and afflictions. ¹⁷ The lord and creator of worlds, seeing the misery of these people, felt compassion for them like a father for his children. ¹⁸ Then, for a moment he pondered within himself, with intensity of thought and for the good of all creatures, how to end the misery of these beings who were subjected to death and despair.

¹⁹ With this thought the lord god Brahma himself established the rules of austerity, piety, charity, veracity and pilgrimage. ²⁰ Having established these, the lord and creator again thought within himself: how to make an end of the many miseries of the men he had created. ²¹ He thought upon self-extinction as the supreme bliss, obtainable only through knowledge of God, and whereby man might be exempted from repeated births and deaths. ²² It was divine knowledge, he thought, that was the only means by which men could crossing the ocean of this world. Austerity, charity and pilgrimage were no means to it. ²³ With this he said, “I will immediately make a new and sure bridge for the salvation of men and for their liberation from pain.”

²⁴ Having thought so, Lord Brahma sitting on the lotus meditated in his mind and produced me from himself. ²⁵ Being thus produced, I immediately stood in the presence of my ancestor, like a wave rising from the sea leans towards it. ²⁶ Holding a pitcher in one hand and prayer beads made of seeds in the other, I bowed down to the god who held a water-pot in one hand and prayer beads in the other. He addressed me like this.

²⁷ “Come my son,” he said, then holding me with his hand, he made me sit on the northern petal of his lotus of truth that shone as brightly as the moon amid silvery clouds. ²⁸ Wearing the skin of an antelope and with the voice of a gander addressing a stork, my father Brahma spoke to me who was similarly dressed. ²⁹ He said “For a moment I will overpower your fickle-mindedness under a mist of unconsciousness, like a dark cloud obscures the moon.”

³⁰ It was under this curse that I lost my reason and forgot everything, even the clear idea I had of God. ³¹ I became as helpless as one out of his wits, and came to be afflicted with distress and sorrow like an indigent person. ³² “Ah, how sorrowful is this world,” said I. “How did evil come to dwell in it?” With these thoughts I remained in silence.

³³ Then he my father spoke to me saying, “Ah my son, why are you so afflicted? Ask me for a remedy for your affliction and you shall become happy.”

³⁴ Then, seated as I was on the gold-colored leaflet of the lotus, I asked the lord creator of all peoples about the medicine for worldly sorrows. ³⁵ “How, my lord,” I asked, “did this world come to be so full of misery, and how can people be rid of it? This is what I ask of you.”

³⁶ I then learnt the most holy wisdom that my father Brahma gave me. Following his advice, I became quite composed. ³⁷ Then, seeing me knowing the knowable and restored to my own natural state, the creator of the world and revealer of all causes said, ³⁸ “My son, I had turned you to insanity by an illusion in order to make you inquire into the essence of true knowledge for the welfare of mankind. ³⁹ Now you are released from the curse of illusion and you have arrived to your highest state of understanding. You have become as one soul (with the Supreme) and as pure as gold. ⁴⁰ Now shut your heart against the world and proceed to the surface of the earth, to the land of Bharata, for the good of mankind. ⁴¹ There employ yourself to ceremonial duties to the best of your knowledge and advise others on how to properly conduct rituals. ⁴² But those who are disgusted (with the world) in their hearts, and are rational with their elevated understandings, are to be counseled with the esoteric knowledge that confers true joy.”

⁴³ Being thus appointed by him who was born in the lotus, I continue to abide here throughout the succession of beings. ⁴⁴ I have no duty to perform here but live my life free from all cares. I always do my acts with a mind as tranquil as if it were in a state of sleep. I do my works with the body, but I do nothing here with my soul (which is fixed in God).

I have fully related to you about the descent of knowledge on earth, the reason for my birth, and the intention of lotus-born Brahma. ² Now Rama, as you are eager to learn transcendental knowledge, and as you are so anxious for it in your mind, it must be the effect of your pristine merit.

³ Rama said, “Sage, how was it that the supreme lord felt a desire to send down knowledge on earth after his creation (and not with it)?”

⁴ Vasishta replied:—

Brahma in his own nature is the same as the Supreme Brahman. He is born in Him like a wave is born of the waters of the deep. ⁵ This great lord saw the imperfection of his creation and saw its whole course in times past, present and future. ⁶ He saw the decay of ceremonial rites after the end of the age of truth (the golden age) and other ages and considering the error in which men were to fall, he felt pity for them. ⁷ Then the lord thought of giving me true knowledge and sent me to earth to dispel the ignorance of mankind.

¹⁴ Every day disputes arise among landowners on account of their estates and properties, and people are subjected to various penalties in large numbers. ¹⁵ Under such conditions, it is not possible to govern without states fighting each other, resulting in rulers and subjects inevitably being reduced to wretchedness. ¹⁶ In order to remove the impotence (of such princes) and lead them to a comprehensive view of things, we have prescribed many excellent precepts of knowledge to them. ¹⁷ This spiritual knowledge was first given to princes, but afterwards it came to be known under the title of royal science (raja vidhya, kingly science). ¹⁸ This royal science is of a hidden, esoteric nature. It is also the best kind of spiritual knowledge. Many kings have been set beyond the reach of calamity by knowledge of this science. ¹⁹ It is after many such fair-famed princes had gone by that your mighty self was begotten by the present King Dasharata.

²⁰ O slayer of your enemies, I find a very agreeable and holy kind of apathy growing spontaneously in your most clear understanding. ²¹ There is another kind of cold-heartedness, O Rama, caused in the minds of the virtuous and reasonable men which is called casual detachment. ²² But your unprecedented and astonishing apathy, produced without any cause and only by your reason, is called by the wise to be real detachment.

³¹ It is by performance of ritual duties and observance of prescribed rules that the demerits of former births are expunged. ³² Upon removing former demerits, understanding turns of itself to become aware of spiritual matters, like the simultaneous flight of a crow towards a falling coconut. ³³ But those devoted only to ritual acts are like people plunged in an eddy in which they whirl up and down until they come to perceive the state of supreme (joy). ³⁴ Seeing this (illusory) state of the world, a man must shake off the delusion of his worldly-mindedness, just as the elephant breaks loose from his chains.

attend to the words of the truth-telling teacher who is asked about anything. ⁴⁷ He is the best inquirer who seeks answers from a person who demonstrates by his actions whether he knows the knowable or not. ⁴⁸ A person who asks boyish questions without determining the teacher's qualifications is reckoned a vile inquirer incapable of knowing great things.

⁴⁹ When asked, a wise man will reply to him who is able to comprehend the former and later propositions, and who is possessed of a good understanding, but he should make no answer to a vile brutish being. ⁵⁰ The teacher who gives his lecture without examining the capacity of the inquirer to grasp his meaning is pronounced unwise by the learned.

bellows. ⁷¹ The true light of things dawns only in the minds of the wise, just as the gentle moon appears only in a clear and cloudless sky. ⁷² He is truly called a man who can judge (the truth) by the major and minor propositions, whose mind is expanded and filled with brilliant ingenuity.

⁷³ Rama, the clear wisdom of your mind makes you shine like the full moon dispelling the darkness of the cloudless sky by her cooling and translucent beams.

Chapter 12 — The Greatness of True Knowledge

Rama, I honor you as one of a perfect mind. You know what to ask and you understand what is spoken to you. Therefore I will continue speaking to you respectfully.

² Be still, keep your mind fixed in yourself, and attend to knowledge. Be free of pride and passions and incline yourself to pure truth. ³ You are possessed of all the qualities of an enquirer, and I those of the speaker, in as much as there are gems in the ocean. ⁴ My son, you have gained the detachment that is closely related to reason, like the humidity of the moonstone correlates to gentle moonbeams. ⁵ Rama, your long and early practiced pure virtues and good qualities have raised your fame, like the long stretching white fibers of the stalk exalt the spotless lotus. ⁶ Now hear the words I tell you Rama, for you alone are fit to receive them, as only the moon is able to open the kumuda lotus petals.

¹⁵ Worldliness is as dangerous a disease as cholera which, unless it is healed in time, is sure to trouble its patient with the torments of hell: ¹⁶ like eating stones; wounded by swords and spears; pelted by stones; burnt by fire; numbed by frost; dislocated limbs; body smeared with blood like sandalwood paste; bored by worms like worm-eaten trees; body pierced by pikes, broomsticks and the fiery shafts and bolts continually falling in battle; toil and drudgery under the sun; the cold wetness of work in a summer fountain house; dumb and deaf without rest or sleep; and, finally, suffering decapitation. ¹⁷ With thousands of such intolerable tortures of worldly life, no one should remain negligent of his release from this state but ought to think that only his reflection on scriptures can produce his real good.

²² Know also that this body of ours is the car, these organs are its horses, our breaths are the winds blowing upon it, and the mind is the driver who feels the delight of driving. The minute, subtle soul is the rider who is conscious of wandering about the world. Knowledge of this truth makes our earthly journey a pleasant one.

Chapter 13 — On Equanimity (Peace & Tranquility of Mind), the Characteristics of a Saint

miseries are as endless as atoms, and our happiness is as small as a drop of water on a piece of straw. Therefore do not fix your sight upon that little happiness which is beset by misery. ²⁴ Let an intelligent man diligently apply himself to attain that state of endless happiness which is free from pain and constitutes his highest completion. ²⁵ They are reckoned the best of men and deserving of completion whose minds are free from the fever (of worldly cares) and attached to the transcendental state.

³⁴ A state reached without return, attained so there is no more cause for sorrow, undoubtedly is attainable only by divine knowledge, and that is a certain truth. ³⁵ Even if such a future state did not exist, there would be no harm to believe in it. But if such a state exists, belief in it will save you from the ocean of this world (samsara).

⁴⁶ It is not to be had by sitting, or going up and down, or by wandering, or by prostrating (before the altar). It is not to be acquired by rakshasa demons, deities or ignorant men. ⁴⁷ That ultimate joy is born of and obtainable from peace of mind. It is fruit from the blossom of peace of the high tree of reason.

⁵⁵ Those holy men who have the lotus-like flower of peacefulness growing in the lotus-shaped receptacle of their hearts are said to have a secondary heart like the two hearts of the god Hari (holding Brahma in one of them). ⁵⁶ They whose untainted faces shine like the moon with the luster of peacefulness are to be honored as the luminaries of their families. Others, seeing the charming beauty of their appearance, honor them as ravishers of the senses.

⁶³ Whether afflicted by disease or disaster, or dragged by the rope of greed, bear yourself up, O Rama, by the composure of your mind. ⁶⁴ Whatever you do and eat with the calm coolness of your mind, all that is far sweeter to the soul than anything sweet to taste. ⁶⁵ The mind that is overpowered by the ambrosial flavor of peacefulness and desists from activity may have the body lacerated, but it will heal shortly.

⁶⁸ The king seated in his palace is not so graceful to see as a quiet peaceful man who is graced by his calm and clarity of understanding. ⁶⁹ There is nothing in life so delightful to see as the satisfaction one feels at the sight of a contented and peaceful man. ⁷⁰ Only he who lives a holy life with his gentle and peaceful conduct is said to be truly living in this world. ⁷¹ A sober minded, meek and honest man pleases everyone by all that he does. It is as if he captivates all beings to himself.

Chapter 14 — On Rational Inquiry, the Necessity of Inquiry & Clear Reasoning

shines in any person, it imparts the coolness and good grace of moonbeams to all things around him. ²³ The reasoning power of man accompanied with the flag of divine knowledge and the silvery fan of good understanding shines like moonlight in the darkness of night. ²⁴ Men with the good grace of their reason throw a sun-like radiance on all sides about them and dispel the gloom of worldliness.

acquainted with their way. They are not liable to pitfalls of constant danger and misery. ⁴⁵ Neither a sick man nor one beset by a hundred evils wails as bitterly as an ignorant man whose soul is deprived of reason. ⁴⁶ Rather leap like a frog in mud, or creep like a worm in the dirt, or lie like a snake in a dark hole or crawl on the ground than walk like a man devoid of reason.

⁵⁴ Now Rama, take delight in such acts as may be productive of utility to the world, and whereby you may arrive to perfection. Weigh all things with the clear eye of reason, which will make you blessed forever.

Contentment (the third gate-keeper) is the chief good. Contentment is called (true) enjoyment, and the contented man, O destroyer of enemies, gets the best repose.² Those who are happy with their prosperity of contentment and possess the calm repose of their souls are like holy saints. They think a kingdom no better than a bit of rotten straw.

Know, O highly intelligent Rama, that the company of the virtuous (the fourth gate-keeper) is everywhere of the greatest benefit to men for their crossing over the ocean of the world (samsara).

²⁷ Therefore, O delight of Raghu's race, bravely govern your mind and always diligently practice some one of these virtues. ²⁸ Exert your best courage to subdue your elephantine mind. Know that until you have mastered one of these cardinal virtues, you can make no progress. ²⁹ It must be, O Rama, that you must set your heart to work by the exertion of your courage and the gnashing of your teeth in order to succeed in meritorious deeds. ³⁰ For whether you be a god, yaksha nature spirit, man, or tree, you cannot, O long-armed Rama, have a better course until you master one of these qualities.

¹³ The next book (Mumukshu Vyavahara Prakaranam, Chapter Concerning the Qualities of the Aspirant for Liberation) dwells on the conduct of one longing after his liberation, and contains a thousand couplets arranged in judicious order. ¹⁴ It describes the nature of men desiring their liberation.

Then follows the third book (Utpatti Prakaranam, Chapter on Creation) on the creation of the world, filled with stories and examples. ¹⁵ It has seven thousand couplets teaching sound philosophy about the spectator and spectacle of the world in the forms of "I" and "you", designated the ego and non-ego. ¹⁶ It contains a description of how the world was produced from its state of non-existence. A diligent attention to this chapter will convey a full knowledge of this world to the mind of the listener.

²⁸ Know all conscious and unconscious things are made of dust.

Next follows the fourth book on Existence (Sthiti Prakaranam). ²⁹ It contains three thousand couplets full of explanations and stories showing the existence of the world to be a form of the essence of the spectator ego. ³⁰ It describes how the spectator (ego) manifests as the spectacle (non-ego), and how the ten-sided sphere of the garden of the world manifests both as subjective and objective (at the same time). ³¹ It has thus arrived at its development which is said to be everlasting.

Next follows the fifth book on peacefulness (Upashanti Prakaranam) consisting of five thousand couplets. ³² The fifth is styled the book on holiness, containing a series of excellent lectures and demonstrating the false conception of the world, as “I”, “you” and “he” (as distinct existences). ³³ The suppression of this error forms the subject of this book. Hearing this chapter on peacefulness serves to put an end to our reincarnations in this world.

⁴⁰ Then follows the sixth book entitled annihilation (Nirvana Prakaranam), which is as clear as the waters of a river after its waves have subsided. ⁴¹ It contains the remaining number of couplets (i.e., the remaining 14,500 couplets of the 32,000 total that is the entire work). Knowledge of these verses is pregnant with great meaning. Their understanding leads to the chief good of utter extinction and pacification of desires. ⁴² The intellect that is separated from all its objects presents the manifestation of the soul, full of intelligence and free from all impurity. It is enveloped in the sheath of infinite void and is wholly pure and devoid of worldly errors.

The previous parts of this work, as already related, give rise to understanding like seeds sown in a good field never fail to produce a good harvest.

² Even human compositions are acceptable when they instruct good sense because men are always required to abide by reason. Otherwise, the Vedas should be renounced as unreliable. ³ Words that conform to reason are to be received even if spoken by children. Otherwise they are to be rejected as straw even if they are pronounced by the lotus-born Brahma himself.

¹⁷ There is a calm tranquility attending the wise at all times and in all conditions. So also does the light of reason, like solar rays, follow the dark night of error. ¹⁸ A man of right judgment has a soul as deep as the ocean and as firm as a mountain, and a cool serenity always shines within him like that of moonlight.

reason illuminates the cloudless region of the mind, no ominous comet of evil can make its appearance. ²² All desires are at rest with the elevated. They are pure with the steady and indifferent to the inert, like a body of light clouds in autumn.

³⁷ The ego and the non-ego, that is, the viewer and the viewed, are both only imaginary monsters of the imagination. Only their annihilation leads to the vision of the soul. ³⁸ The error of the reality of ego and the perceptible world will vanish away like visions in a dream, for who that knows the falsehood of dreams will fall into the error (of taking them for truth)? ³⁹ As an imaginary palace gives no joy or grief to anyone, the false conception of the world is the same.

⁴² Even the plucking of a flower or tearing of its leaflet requires a little effort, but no exertion whatever is required to gain the blessed state. ⁴³ Plucking or pulling off a flower involves an action of the body, but with yoga there is no physical action. You only have to fix your mind. ⁴⁴ It can be practiced with ease by anyone sitting in his easy seat and fed with his usual food who is not addicted to gross pleasures or breaching the rules of good conduct. ⁴⁵ You can derive happiness from your own observations at any place and time, as you can from your association with the good whenever it is available. This is an optional rule.

⁴⁸ Attend now, Rama, to what I am going to say in another way with regard to advancing in knowledge and improving one's understanding. ⁴⁹ Hear now a new method in which this scripture is learned, and its true sense interpreted to people by means of its exposition.

⁵⁶ In such cases, no material example can apply to the incorporeal Brahma, and no optional and ambiguous expression can give a definite idea of him.

⁵⁸ Earlier and later developments of this non-entity (the world) are considered to exist in the present moment. Waking and dreaming states are known from our boyhood. ⁵⁹ The comparison of the existence of the world with the dreaming state is exact in all instances because our desires, thoughts, pleasures and displeasures, and all other acts are the same in both states. ⁶⁰ This work and all others composed by other authors on the means of salvation have pursued the same plan in their explanation of the knowable. ⁶¹ The resemblance of the world to a dream is found also in the scriptures and the Vedanta. It is not to be explained in a word, but requires a continued course of lectures. ⁶² Such writings also cite comparisons of the world to the images in a dream or an imaginary paradise of the mind in preference to other similes.

partial comparison, as in the instance of sense and light. The simile consists in the brightness of both.

³ Therefore it is useless to talk of either complete or partial agreement between example and the exemplar. It is enough for the purpose of the comparison to comprehend the meaning of the holy word in some way or other. ⁴ Know your peace to be the chief good and be diligent to secure it. When you have food to eat, it is useless to talk about how you came by it. ⁵ A cause is compared with something that has no cause at all, and a comparison is given to express its partial agreement in some respect with the compared object.

as the cause of everything in its act of creation at the beginning of creation, and it became perceptible by itself. ²² Causation is a product of the discrimination of the living soul, previously in a state of non-existence, until it became manifest as existent in the form of the material world.

²³ Reason says that the same being that destroys the body also produced it of itself and manifests itself in its transcendental magnitude (of intelligence). ²⁴ When a man, through the exercise of his reason, comes to know the soul, he finds before him the presence of the indescribable being. ²⁵ The mind being free from desire, the organs of sense are relieved from their action and the soul becomes devoid of the results of its past actions. ²⁶ The mind being set at ease and freed from its desires, the organs of action are restrained from their acts, like an engine stopped in its motion.

²⁹ All spiritual knowledge is holy wherever it is found in anyone. It adds a luster to the body and mind like that of the expanded region of the sky. ³⁰ He sees the appearances of all visible objects and maintains his own position among them. He views the spirit in the same light in which it presents itself in any place. ³¹ Wherever the Universal Soul appears itself in any light, it remains there and then in the same form in which it exhibits itself to us. ³² The Universal Soul being alike in all, the looker and the object seen are both the same being. The looker and the looked being one, their appearance as otherwise is all unreal.

Chapter 20 — On Wisdom & Good Conduct

² Whatever man excels in any quality, that distinguishes him. Therefore learn and improve your understanding from him.

¹² I have already expounded to you, O Rama, the rule of good conduct. Now I will explain to you fully the way of gaining learning.

BOOK III
On Creation
(Utpatti Khanda)

This section deals with the origin and nature of the universe. According to Vasishta, this universe with its innumerable objects, its concepts of time and space, and its varied laws is only a creation of ones own mind. Just as the mind creates a world in the dream state, so it also creates an imaginary world in the waking state. The only difference between the dream and the waking states is that dreams are short and the waking state is relatively longer. Time and space are only ideas of the mind. Through the minds perception many thousands of years may pass as a moment, or a moment in time in the waking state may be experienced as years in the dream state. The same is true of the concept of space. All these facts are illustrated by a number of interesting and revealing stories.

Chapter 1 — The Appearance of Creation Is from the Mind of Brahma

¹ It is through both words and lights (i.e., the words of the scripture and the lights of nature and reason) that the knower of the great god perceives the spirit of Brahma appearing within himself, like in a dream. He also knows him as such who understands him according to the holy text, “What this is, that is the self.” ² This passage shows, in short, the visible world at its creation residing in the empty bosom of Brahma. What this creation is, from where it arises, and how it becomes extinct in the end are now to be known in detail. ³ O intelligent Rama, now hear me expound to you all things according to my best knowledge and agreeably to their nature and substance in the order of creation.

⁷ Whoever is born in this world continues to progress until at last he obtains his final liberation (his ultimate perfection) or rises to heaven or falls into hell. ⁸ Therefore I shall expound for your understanding everything relating to the production and continuance of things, and their prior states as they were. ⁹ Now hear me, Rama, give you a brief abstract of this book. Later I will expand upon it so that you may know more of how creation is produced.

meaning of the immensity which contains the world. But the word 'world' contains no idea of Brahma, and neither does 'bracelet' convey the idea of gold. The substance contains the form just as a stone does the statue, but the form does not contain the substance.

²¹ Now hear me relate to you, O moon-faced Rama, about the nature of this bondage, whereby you will be able to know the mode and manner of our liberation from it.

²⁵ Truth is not to be obtained by philosophers chopping logic or by pilgrimage or ceremonial acts, any more than believing in the reality of the material world. ²⁶ It is hard to avoid the sight of the phenomenal world and to repress one's ardor for it. But it is certain that phenomena can not lead us to Reality, and that the Real cannot mislead us to unreality.

when he again becomes subject to his sense of the sufferings of the world, like a vale of tears? ³⁶ But if one can attain a state of unalterable separation of his thoughts from all worldly objects, as he has in his state of deep sleep, then he is said to have reached the highest level of holiness on earth.

Chapter 2 — Description of the First Cause: Yama Explains Air-born Brahma to Death; Will without Form or Action

Rama, now listen as I relate the story of Akasaja, the air-born brahmin, which will be precious to your ears and will enable you to better to understand the drift of this book of creation.

² There lived a brahmin named Akasaja who always sat reclined in his meditation and was ever inclined to do good to all creatures. ³ Finding him long-lived, Death thought to himself, “Only I am imperishable, and I devour all things one by one. ⁴ How is it that I cannot stuff myself with this air-born? I find my teeth as blunt on him as the edge of a sword on solid rock.” ⁵ So thinking, he proceeded to the home of the brahmin intent upon making an end of him. For who is not so dull in nature that he is not alert in his practice?

⁶ But as Death was about to enter Akasaja’s house, he was opposed by a fire as powerful as that in the final destruction of the last day of the world’s dissolution. ⁷ He passed through the flames and entered the house where, seeing the holy man before him, he greedily stretched out his hand to grab him. ⁸ Even with his hundred hands, Death was unable to grasp the holy man, just as it is impossible for the strongest to withstand a determined man in his habitual course.

¹² Thereupon Death gladly wandered about in all the places under the horizon. He roved over inhabited lands as he did throughout empty and river lands. ¹³ He traversed forests and jungles, marshy and rocky grounds, and maritime coasts. He traveled to foreign lands and islands and pried through their wildernesses, cities and towns. ¹⁴ He searched through kingdoms and countries, villages and deserts. He surveyed the entire earth to find out some act of the brahmin or any part of it.

After much thought, Yama replied as follows. ¹⁸ “Know, O Death, that this air-born seer has no act whatever because he is born of empty air. Therefore his doings are all null and void. ¹⁹ Whoever is born of air is as pure as air itself and has no combination of cause or actions such as all embodied beings. ²⁰ He has no relationship with acts of his prior existence. He is as nothing as the child of a barren woman, like one unborn, uncreated and un-begotten. ²¹ Want of causes has made him a pure empty being, and the lack of prior acts has made him as nothing as an ethereal tree.”

³¹ “Say, how can you lay hold of a being who has done no act and is not in the act of doing anything at present? It is only subject to you when it thinks itself mortal. ³² You are easily able to take anyone who believes his soul to be of this earth and thinks himself to be an earthly being. ³³ Because this brahmin disowns the material body, he is a formless being. Therefore it is as hard for you to enthrall him as it is to use a rope to tie the air.”

³⁴ Death replied saying, “Tell me my lord, how may the unborn (aja) or the self-born (swayambhu) be produced out of vacuum, and how can an earthly or other elemental body both be and not be?”

⁴¹ “That which is simply emptiness and pure light, unlike an embodied being, is never beset by the traps of new desires. ⁴² It has nothing to know or see without itself. The only conception that we can have of it is that it resembles an extended intelligence. ⁴³ Under these circumstances, how is it susceptible to any earthly or other external form? Therefore, O Death, give up your attempts to lay hold of Brahman.”

⁴⁵ Rama said, “Sage, you said that Brahma is your great father. I think you meant to say that your father is the unborn, self-born Universal Soul and consciousness.”

Vasishta speaking:—

⁴⁶ What I had described to you, Rama, is Brahma, and the previous story about the discussion between Death and Yama also regards Brahma.

⁴⁷ Again when Death over the course of a manvantara of time had made an end to all living beings, he thought himself strong enough to make an attempt to bear down upon the lotus-born Brahma also. ⁴⁸ It was then that he was rebuked by Yama, saying, “It is your habit that makes you go on your accustomed course of killing. ⁴⁹ But the super-ethereal form of Brahma is beyond your reach because it simply has of the nature of the mind, connected only with its thoughts and having no concern with the actual forms of things.”

⁵⁰ Brahma is wonderfully empty consciousness having the faculty of thought. Thus consciousness, being only emptiness, has neither any cause that created it nor any effect created by it. ⁵¹ As the insubstantial principle of will in men manifests itself without being connected with material forms, so the self-born Brahma manifests to all in his own immaterial nature.

Chapter 3 — Subtle & Gross Bodies; Formless Mind (Brahma) Wills the Appearance of Forms

¹ Rama said, “It is even so as you have said, that the mind is a pure essence and has no connection with the earth and other material substances. Mind is truly Brahma itself. ² Now tell me, O holy one, why the memory of his former states does not cause his birth, as it is in the case of mine, yours and of all other beings.”

³ Vasishta replied:—

Whoever had a former body, accompanied with the acts of his prior existence, necessarily retains its memories, which are the cause of his being reborn. ⁴ But when Brahman is known to have no prior act, how is it possible for him to have memory of anything? ⁵ Therefore he exists without any other cause except the causation of his own mind. It is by his own causality that the Divine Spirit is self-born, and is himself his own spirit. ⁶ He is everlasting. His body is born of itself from the self-existent Brahman. This unborn or self-born Brahma has no material body whatever, except his subtle spirit body (ativahika) or astral body (linga deha).

⁷ Rama said, “The everlasting body is one thing and the mortal body is another. Now tell me sage whether all created beings have a subtle body like that of Brahma?”

⁸ Vasishta replied:—

All created beings produced of a cause have two bodies (subtle and gross). But the unborn being which is without a cause has only one body. ⁹ The uncreated Brahman is the cause of all created beings, but the uncreated spirit, having no cause for itself, has only one body. ¹⁰ The prime lord of creatures has no material body but manifests himself in the empty form of his spiritual body. ¹¹ His body is composed of only mind and he has no connection with the earth or any other material substance. He is the first lord of creatures who stretched creation from his empty body.

¹² All creation is only forms of images or ideas in his empty mind. They have no other pattern or originality in their nature. It is a truth well known to everyone that everything is of the same nature with its cause.

¹⁸ The empty, immaterial and formless spirit is described as the self-born and corporeal lord of creatures in the form of the first male. ¹⁹ He remains imperceptible in his state of pure consciousness, but becomes manifest to all by the evolution of his will. He cannot be discerned in his absolute state (of inaction), but becomes conspicuous to us in the display of his nature (in creation).

²⁰ Brahma is the divine power of will. He is personified as the first male agent of creation, but he is devoid of any physical body. He has only the spiritual form of the mind, and he is the sole cause of the existence of the three worlds.

²¹ It is Brahma's will that makes the self-born exert his energies, just as human desires impel all mankind to action, and as the empty mind manifests itself as a mountain of desires. ²² Then it forgets its everlasting and incorporeal nature and assumes to itself a solid material body and shows itself in the shape of a deceptive apparition. ²³ But Brahma, who is of an unsullied understanding, is not involved in forgetting himself. That occurs through the transformation of his unknowable nature to the known state of will. ²⁴ Being unborn of material substance, he sees no appearance like others who are exposed by their ignorance to the misleading errors of falsehood that appear before them like a mirage.

²⁵ As Brahma is merely of the form of the mind, and not composed of any material substance, so the world being the product of the eternal mind is of the same nature as its original source. ²⁶ Again, as the uncreated Brahma has no cause for himself, so his creation has no cause other than himself. ²⁷ Therefore there is no difference between product and its producer, and it is certain that the work must be as perfect as its author.

³⁷ Whatever you see in a dream, whatever desires you have at heart, and all the ideals of your fancy, together with your ideas, notions and impressions of phenomena, know that it is your mind that is the receptacle for them all. ³⁸ But the mind can choose to hold phenomena as desirable, making them as harmful to their beholder as an apparition is to a child. ³⁹ The ideal of phenomena develops itself as the germ contained in the seed and, in its proper time and place, it becomes a large tree.

⁴⁰ If there is no rest with what is real, there can be no peace with phenomena that are full of troubles and give no solace to the mind. It is impossible for the feeling of the perception of phenomena to ever be lost to their perceiver, yet only its subsidence is said to constitute liberation.

Chapter 4 — Nightfall; Creation of Objects

While Vasishtha, the leading sage, was speaking without interruption, the entire assembly was intent upon listening to him with a fixed tone and tenor of their minds. ² The string of bells that warriors tie to their waists ceased to jingle. Everyone was motionless. Even the parrots in their cages ceased to warble or flutter. ³ The ladies forgot their dalliance and remained quietly attentive to the lecture. Everyone in the royal hall was fixed in attention as if they were paintings and statues.

¹¹ Upon this, sage Vasishtha stopped his sweet speech and said, "Let what has been said, mighty king, be all for this day. I will resume my lecture and speak of other things tomorrow."

¹³ For his own good he honored the godly sage and the other seers and brahmins with due respects and offerings of flowers, water, worthy honorary gift rewards, fees, gifts and homage. ¹⁴ Then rose the entire assembly with the king and the sages. The gems and jewels that decked princes and people shed their luster on the faces of all. ¹⁵ There was a commingled tinkling of bracelets and armlets as the throng mingled in their exit, mixed with the flashes of the necklaces and brocades that decorated their bodies. ¹⁶ The jewels attached to the tufts and crests of hair on the tops of their heads emitted a jingling sound resembling the humming of bees amidst their flowery braids. ¹⁷ The face of the sky, shining on all sides with a purple color reflected by the golden ornaments on their persons, seemed as if it was pleased with the wise sayings and sense of the sage.

²² The birds of air took to their rest in the hollows of mango trees or on the tops of kadamba trees, like honest people of fair dealing find their rest in the purity of their minds and the contriteness of their inner hearts.

³⁶ Then Rama addressed Vasishtha, the most eloquent of sages, with honey-like words about the subject under investigation. ³⁷ He said, "Tell me plainly, O venerable sir, about the form of the mind, which developed itself in all things of the universe as they were its offshoots."

Rama, the mind has no form that anyone can see. Other than its name, it has nothing substantial, only the formless and irremovable void. ³⁹ The mind as an entity (sat) is not situated in any part of the outer body, nor is it within any cavity of the heart or brain. But know it, O Rama, to be situated everywhere as the all encompassing void. ⁴⁰ This world is produced from it, and it is like the waters of the mirage. It manifests itself in the forms of its fleeting thoughts, which are as false as the appearance of secondary moons in mists.

⁴¹ The thinking principle is generally believed to be something between the positive and negative, or real and unreal. You must know it as such and no other. ⁴² That which represents of all objects is called the mind. There is nothing else to which the term mind is applicable. ⁴³ Know that will (volition) is the same as the mind, and that the mind is no different from the will, just as fluidity is the same with water, and as there is no difference between air and its motion in wind. ⁴⁴ For wherever there is any will, there also is that attribute of the mind. Nobody has ever taken will and mind to be different things.

⁴⁵ The representation of any object, whether real or unreal, is mind, and that is to be known as Brahma the great father of all. ⁴⁶ The incorporeal soul in the body is called the mind and it has in itself the knowledge of all senses and everlasting ideas of the physical world. (I.e., the sentient and thinking soul is the same as the mind.) ⁴⁷ The learned have given different names like ignorance, intellect, mind, bondage, sin and darkness to the visible appearance of creation. ⁴⁸ The mind has no form other than a receptacle and reflector of ideas about the visible world which, I repeat, is no new creation, but a reflection of the mind.

⁵⁸ After suppression of the sense of “I” and “you” and the error of the reality of the outer world, the observer becomes withdrawn and remains in his sitting posture without seeing external things.

⁵⁹ Rama replied, “If I cannot suppress my perception of entity, or an entity is unable to become a non-entity, or if I am unable to see phenomena as non-existent, ⁶⁰ then tell me, O holy one, how can I to uproot this disease of our eagerness for phenomena from the mind, a disease which bewilders understanding and afflicts us with a series of troubles?”

⁶¹ Vasishta replied:—

Now hear my advice, Rama, for the suppression of this illusion of phenomena, whereby it will surely die away and become utterly extinct.

⁶² Know Rama, that nothing that is can ever be destroyed or become extinct. Though you remove it, yet it will leave its seed or trace in the mind. ⁶³ This seed is the memory of such things which reopens the ideas of the phenomena in the mind, expanding themselves in the fallacious notions of the forms of big worlds and skies, mountains and oceans. ⁶⁴ These fallacious notions, called faults and defects of understanding, are obstacles in the way to liberation, but they do not affect the sages who are liberated.

⁶⁵ Again, if the world and all other phenomena have real existence, they cannot confer liberation on anyone because phenomena, whether they are situated within or without us, are themselves perishable. ⁶⁶ Learn therefore this solemn truth, which will be fully explained to you in the subsequent parts of this work, ⁶⁷ that all things appearing in the forms of emptiness, elementary forms, the world, and “I” and “you” are non-entities. They have no meaning.

⁷⁰ Nothing visible is real, and there is neither spectator nor spectacle here. There is nothing like emptiness or solidity in nature. All this is only a piece of extended Intelligence.

Know Rama, that I do not speak contradictions. Hear me explain how unreality appears as real, like the proverb of the son of a barren woman.

⁷⁶ All this was unproduced before and did not exist in the beginning of creation. It comes to appearance from the mind like a city in a dream. ⁷⁷ The mind also was not produced in the beginning of creation and was an unreality itself. Therefore hear me tell you how we come to a notion of it.

⁷⁸ This unreal mind by itself spreads the false and changing scenes of the visible world, just as in a dream we see ever changing unrealities as true. ⁷⁹ Then the mind exerts its will in the fabrication of the body and spreads the magic scene of the phenomenal world far and wide. ⁸⁰ The mind, by the potential of its fluctuations, has many actions of its own, such as expansion, jumping, motion, craving, wandering, diving and seizing, and many other voluntary efforts.

Chapter 5 — On the Original Cause (Mula-Karana)

¹ Rama said, “O chief of the sages, what is the cause that leads to our misconception of the mind? How it is produced, and what is the source of its illusion? ² Tell me sage, in brief, about the first production (of the mind), and then, O best of the eloquent, you may say what else there is to be said on the subject.”

Incident to the universal dissolution, when all things are reduced to nothing, this infinity of visible objects remains in a state of calm and quiet before their creation. ⁴ There is only great God in existence, who is uncreated and without decay, who is the creator of all at all times, who is all in all and Supreme Soul of all, and who resembles the sun that never sets. ⁵ He whom language fails to describe, and who is known only to the liberated, who is termed the soul only by fiction and not by his real nature (which is unknowable). ⁶ He is the Cosmic Man (purusha) of the Samkhya philosophers, the Brahman of Vedanta followers, the Intelligence of Gnostics, wholly pure and apart from all. ⁷ He is known as Vacuum by vacuists, and the One who gives the sun its light. He is truth itself, the power of speech and thought and vision, and all action and passion forever.

¹⁰ It is He to whom these multitudes of visible creations return, like the waters of the earth to the sea, and who enlightens all souls and bodies like a lamp. ¹¹ He is present alike in heaven, in earth, and in the nether worlds, who abides equally in all bodies whether of the mineral, vegetable or animal. He resides alike in each particle of dust as in the high and huge mountain ranges, and He rides as swiftly on the wings of winds as He sleeps in the depths of the earth. ¹² He appoints the eight internal and external organs of sense and action to their several functions, and He has made dull and dumb creatures as inert as stones and mute as if they sitting in meditation. ¹³ He has filled the skies with emptiness and the rocks with solidity. He has dissolved waters to fluidity and has concentrated all light and heat in the sun. ¹⁴ He has spread these wonderful scenes of the world like clouds sprinkle charming showers of rain, both as endless and constant as they are charming and sweet to sight.

¹⁶ His spirit is the indestructible soul that resides as the germ of decay and destruction inside animals. It is so minute as to lie hidden within the body, and so huge as to fill all existence.

²⁴ Having thus made the infinite hosts of worlds in the immense sphere of the universe, He is yet neither the agent of any action nor the author of any act in it, but remains ever the same as the sole One alone, in His unchangeable and unimpaired state of self-consciousness, and without any fluctuation, evolution or adhesion of Himself, as He is quite unconcerned with the world.

It is by the knowledge of this transcendent Supreme Spirit and God of gods that one may become an adept, and not by the rigor of religious austerities and practices. ² Here nothing else is needed than the culture and practice of divine knowledge, and thereby the truth being known, one views the errors of the world like a satisfied traveler looks at a mirage in a clear light.

⁷ Rama said, "Having known the Self in himself, one is no more exposed to the evils of life or even of death itself. ⁸ But say, how is this great God of gods to be attained from such great distance (as we are placed from Him), and what rigorous austerities and amount of pains are necessary for it?"

⁹ Vasishta replied:—

He is to be known through your courageous efforts (in knowledge and faith) and by the aid of clear understanding and right reasoning, and never by the practice of austerities or ablutions, or by acts attended with bodily pain of any kind. ¹⁰ For know, O Rama, that all your austerities and charities, your painstaking and mortification, are of no efficacy unless you wholly renounce your passions and enmity, your anger, pride and selfishness, and your envy and jealousy. ¹¹ For whoever with a heart full of vile passions is liberal with money he has earned by defrauding others, the merit of such liberality accrues to the rightful owner of the property and not to its professed donor. ¹² Whoever observes any vow or rite with a mind moved by passions, he passes for a hypocrite and reaps no benefit of his acts.

¹⁵ Now learn what this courage is so that you may attain wisdom and annihilate the maladies of passions, affections and animosity in your nature. ¹⁶ True courage consists in remaining in an honest calling that conforms with the law and good customs of your country, and in a contented mind that shrinks from savoring the enjoyments of life. ¹⁷ It consists in the exertion of one's energies to the utmost of his power, without bearing any murmur or grief in his soul, and in one's devotion to the society of the good and perusal of good works and scriptures.

mind, and who have known their own natures and those of all others by their right reasoning, are honored by the gods Brahma, Vishnu, Indra and Shiva.²⁰ One should diligently turn towards he who is called righteous by a majority of good people as the best and most upright of men.²¹ The best scriptures are considered to be those which deal primarily with spiritual knowledge. One who constantly meditates on them is surely liberated.

²² It is by means of right discrimination derived from keeping good company and studying holy works that our understanding is cleared of its ignorance, just like dirty water is purified by kata seeds, and as the minds of men are purified by the by philosophy of yoga.

Chapter 7 — God Is Pure Consciousness; the Phenomenal World Is Non-Existent

¹ Rama said, “Tell me, O holy one, about this God that you have spoken of, whose knowledge, you said, leads to our liberation. Where is He situated and how can I know Him?”

² Vasishta replied:—

This God of whom I spoke is not at any distance from us. He is situated within these our bodies, and He is known to us as the form of pure Consciousness. ³ He is All in all, but all this world is not the omnipresent Himself. He is One alone, but is not all that is visible.

⁵ Rama replied, “So it is, and even children say that if the whole world is mere Consciousness, then why call it by another name? What is the use of teaching anyone about it (when everyone is full of Intelligence)?”

⁶ Vasishta replied:—

If you believe pure Consciousness is the same as the intelligent world, then you know nothing about how to get rid of this world. ⁷ The world is truly intelligent, O Rama, but the animal soul is called a brutish (pashu, animal) observer of things because it looks only after sensual gratifications, which gives rise to only fears of disease, decay and death. ⁸ The animal soul (jiva), though an incorporeal substance, is an ignorant thing and subject to pain and sorrow. The mind (manas) also, though capable of intelligence, has become the root of all evils. ⁹ Intellectual liberation from thoughts of the world is one state; unintelligent gazing at it is another. He who knows the better of these two states of the soul has no cause of sorrow.

¹³ Rama said, “Sage, tell me about that empty animal soul, and how the knowledge of such soul does not enable one to get rid of his reincarnation. ¹⁴ Tell me also, who is that man who by company with the good and study of good works has crossed the ocean of the world and beholds the Supreme Soul in himself?”

¹⁵ Vasishta replied:—

Whatever animal souls, having been cast into the wilderness of this life, long after this intelligent soul, they are truly wise and know Him (in themselves). ¹⁶ Whoever believes the animal soul to be the life of the world and thinks Consciousness requires pain, he can never know Him anywhere. ¹⁷ If the Supreme Soul is known to us, O Rama, the succession of our sorrows is ended, like the fatal cholera after extraction of its poison.

¹⁸ Rama said, “Tell me, O holy one, about the true form of the Supreme Soul, by light of which the mind may escape from all its errors.”

¹⁹ Vasishta replied:—

The Supreme Soul is seen in ourselves and within our bodies in the same way as we are conscious that our minds are still be within us after its flight to distant countries. ²⁰ Our notion of the Supreme Spirit is often lost in the depth of our minds in the same way as the existence of the outer world becomes extinct in our consciousness during yoga meditation. ²¹ We lose our sense of seeing and the seen in the knowledge of Him who is a non-empty vacuum or a substantive emptiness. ²² He whose substance appears as a vacuum and in whom exists the empty fullness of the universe, and who appears as emptiness itself, in spite of the multitude of His creation existing in Him, is truly the form of the Supreme Soul. ²³ The form of the Supreme Soul (that you want to know) is He who though full of intelligence, appears to stand before us like an unconscious huge rock, and who, though quite subtle in his nature, seems to be some gross body to our conception. ²⁴ That which encompasses the inside and outside of everything, and assumes the name and nature of everything to itself, is truly the form of the Supreme.

²⁶ Rama asked, “But how are we to understand that He who bears the name and nature of absolute and infinite reality should yet be compressed within anything visible in the world? Such is quite impossible to believe.”

²⁷ Vasishta replied:—

The false conception of the creation of the world resembles the false impression of colors in the clear sky. It is wrong, O Rama, to take something as real which does not exist in nature.

²⁸ It is the knowledge of Brahman that constitutes His form, or else there is no act of His whereby He may be known to us. He is entirely devoid of any visible form, and therefore there is no better way for anyone other than to know Him as truth. ²⁹ After all trace of phenomena is gone, there remains a pre-eminent object of conception, which is inborn and manifest of itself. ³⁰ This concept of the Super-eminent, having no visible appearance, often has no reflection, and at other times it is reflected in the mirror of the mind.

³³ Vasishta replied:—

If you stay in the company of holy men a few days, and if you study sacred scriptures with a steady mind with me, ³⁴ then I will purge this false view of phenomena from your understanding, like a delusive mirage from one’s sight. This absence of the view will extinguish your sense of being the viewer, and restore you to your intelligence alone.

³⁵ When the viewer is united with the view, and the view with the viewer, then duality becomes unity; duality blends into an inseparable unity. ³⁶ Without union of the two there is no success of either. When viewer and the view have disappeared, only one unity remains.

⁴¹ I will explain it fully by other examples whereby this truth may appear of itself and impress itself irresistibly in your mind. ⁴² How can something be said to exist that was never brought into existence? How can there be water in the mirage, or the ring of an eclipse in the moon? ⁴³ As a barren woman has no son and a mirage has no water, and as the sky has no plant growing in it, so there is no such thing as what we falsely call the world.

Chapter 8 — Nature of Good Scriptures; Yoga Vasishtha as the Treasury of All

² Vasishtha answered:—

This endemic of fallacious knowledge (of the reality of the world) has been prevalent for a long time. It is only by true knowledge that this wrong application of the word “world” can be removed from the mind.

³ I will tell you a story, Rama, for your success in this knowledge. If you pay attention to it, you will become both intelligent and liberated. ⁴ But if the impatience of a brutish creature makes you get up and leave after hearing only half of this story, then you shall reap no benefit from it. ⁵ Whoever seeks some object and strives after it, he of course succeeds in getting it; but if he becomes tired of it he fails.

⁶ Rama, if you keep to the company of the good and to the study of good scriptures, then surely you will arrive at your state of perfection in course of a few days or months, according to the degree of your diligence.

⁷ Rama said, “O you, who are best acquainted with the scriptures, tell me which is the best scripture for the attainment of spiritual knowledge, such that its familiarity may release us from the sorrows of this life?”

⁸ Vasishtha replied:—

Know, O high minded Rama, that this work is the best of all others on spiritual knowledge. It is the auspicious (Yoga Vasishtha) Great Ramayana, the scripture of scriptures. ⁹ This Ramayana is the best of histories, and it serves to enlighten understanding. It is known to contain the essence of all histories. ¹⁰ But by hearing these doctrines one easily finds his liberation coming of itself to him. This is why it is regarded as the most holy writing.

Chapter 9 — Description of Living & Bodiless Liberation; God as the Supreme Cause of All (Parama Karana)

They are truly delighted and gratified who with all their hearts and minds are always devoted to holy conversation among themselves. ² Those devoted to the acquisition of knowledge and investigation of spiritual science enjoy the same bliss of liberation in their living state as it is said to attend disembodied souls.

³ Rama said, “Tell me, O holy one, the difference between liberation with and without a body, that I may try to learn with an understanding enlightened by the light of scriptures.”

⁴ Vasishta said:—

Whoever remains as he is and continues intact as emptiness amidst society is called the liberated while in the body (jivan mukta). ⁵ Who remains employed only in his exercise of intellect and seems to be sleeping in his waking state, though he is conducting his worldly affairs, is called liberated while in the body. ⁶ One whose countenance is neither flushed nor dejected in pleasure or pain, and who remains content with what he gets, is called liberated while living. ⁷ One whose waking is like the state of sound sleep, who is not awake to the accidents of the waking state, and whose waking state does not sense the desires incident to it, is called liberated in his life.

⁸ Who, though moved by feelings of affection, enmity, fear and the like, is at rest, as clear and undisturbed as emptiness within himself, is called liberated while he is alive. ⁹ Who has not an air of pride in him, and is not conceited when he does or refrains to do anything, is called self-liberated in his lifetime. ¹⁰ Who with one glance or the wink of his eye has a full view of the whole of creation and the final destruction of the world, like the Supreme Self, is said to be liberated in his lifetime.

¹⁴ Now leaving the subject of liberated while in the body, I will describe what they call liberation without body (videhamukta) which enters the soul like a breath of wind after it has fled from the mortal body. ¹⁵ The disembodied free spirit neither rises nor sets, nor is it subject to wane. It is neither manifest nor hidden. It is not at a distance, nor is it in me, you or in any other person.

burns and melts in them by itself. It sheds ambrosia in the form of the moon, and causes death in the shape of poison.²⁰ It becomes light with which it fills the sky, and it spreads darkness in the form of dullness (tamas). It becomes vacuum to leave empty space for all, while in the form of hills it obstructs their free passage on earth.²¹ In the form of the fleet mind it moves the self-moving animals, and in the form of dull matter it fixes that which is incapable of motion. It girds the earth by its form of the ocean, just like a bracelet encircles the arm.

²² The bodiless spirit takes upon it the great body of the sun and illuminates all the worlds with their minute particles while it remains quiet in itself.²³ Whatever is shining in this universe or ever was or is to be so, in any of the three — past, present and future times — know them all, O Rama, as forms of the Divine Spirit.

²⁵ Vasishta replied:—

This liberation is called nirvana and it is also called Brahman. Attend now to the means of its attainment.

²⁶ All such visible objects known as “I”, “you”, “this” and the like, because they are unproduced from the eternal being (sat) of God, it is impossible to have any conception of them in our minds.

²⁷ Rama said, “I think, O best of them who know the knowable, that the bodiless souls of the liberated, when they pass through the bounds of the three worlds, have to be born again according to the course of nature.”

²⁸ Vasishta replied:—

Those who retain a memory of the three worlds have to move about in them, but those who have lost the idea of their existence are absorbed in infinity.²⁹ For how can one derive knowledge of the unity of God from his belief in duality, the separate existence of the world? Therefore the figurative sense of the cosmos as God (Vishwa) can not give the spiritual and infinite idea of Brahma.

³⁴ As emptiness abides in air and water appears in the burning deserts, and as there is light spread over all creation, so the spirit of Brahma manifests in the three worlds in the forms of the very worlds themselves.

³⁵ Rama said, “Tell me, O sage, what makes this world, with its nature of absolute non-existence, exhibit such distinct appearances in its phenomena?³⁶ Tell me also, if the viewer and the view both become extinct, how can their nirvana or absorption in the deity remain without their personalities?

³⁷ Again, as it is impossible to conceive the existence of phenomena, say how is it possible to conceive the existence of the invisible Brahma in his own nature? ³⁸ By what mode of reasoning can this truth be known and ascertained and, this being accomplished, there remains nothing else to be inquired into?"

³⁹ Vasishta replied:—

This false knowledge or predisposition towards the reality of the world has been long prevalent, like a chronic disease, and must be removed only by the specific mantra of reasoning. ⁴⁰ However, it can not be expelled quickly or in a minute. That requires some time, like the ascent and descent of an even sided precipice. ⁴¹ Therefore listen to what I say in order to dispel your fallacy of the world through arguments, logical inferences, and habitual meditation.

⁴² Rama, listen to a tale that I am to tell for your attainment of this knowledge. By hearing it you will become intelligent, wise and liberated. ⁴³ I will now talk about the subject of the production of the world in order to show you that all that is produced serves to bind our souls to the earth, and so that you may live quite free from such bondage. ⁴⁴ I will tell you about creation and how the false conception of the world is as unsubstantial as emptiness itself.

⁴⁸ There was no air or form of anything, no sight or anything to be seen. There were no multitudes of created and material beings that appear to be endless and everlasting to view. ⁴⁹ There was a nameless Self, the fullest of the full in its form. It was neither entity nor non-entity, neither reality nor unreality. ⁵⁰ It was mere Intellect without its exercise of intellect, Infinite without decay, auspicious and full of bliss. It was without beginning, middle or end, eternal and imperishable.

⁵³ He is also that (intellectual) light whereby we discern the form of that real and unreal Being in his perspective of creation, as the One without beginning or end, and as presenting an image without color or shade. ⁵⁴ He is that empty Soul who views the worlds as clearly as the yogi with his half closed eyes who fixes his sight between his eyebrows and beholds Him in the form of indescribable light. ⁵⁵ He is the cause of all, He whose cause is as nothing as the horns of a rabbit, and whose works, like so many waves of the sea, are all these worlds.

⁵⁸ It is His pulsation that vibrates throughout the universe and it is His inertia that stops the course of the whole. It is on that pivot that the world has its revolution, just like a whirling firebrand describes a circle.

⁶¹ He is always awake in His ever sleeping state, and therefore cannot be said to be waking or sleeping anywhere at anytime. He is both awake and asleep everywhere and at all times. ⁶² His quiescence is attended with bliss and tranquility, and His agitation puts the world in motion and in its course of action, yet He is said to remain unaltered in both states which unite in Him.

⁶⁷ It is because of our lack of knowledge of Him that we are in constant dread of this delusive world, just as we are afraid of snakes. It is at His sight that all our fears and desires fly far away from us.

⁶⁸ It is in the presence of the clear light of that God of truth that all the wishes of our minds have a better play, just like actors dance best when they have light.

⁷¹ He who manifests Himself as the soul abiding in me, you and in every other person, yet is not me, you, he or it, is the Supreme Soul or Self that is the same with and apart from all. ⁷² It is He and the same being, whether you view Him in one or more objects, as it is the same water that heaves itself in this or the other wave. Thus all visible phenomena have their rise from Him. ⁷³ He from whom time has its counting and that which can be seen has its appearance, by whom the mind exercises its thinking powers, and by whose light the world is enlightened, is the Supreme. ⁷⁴ Whatever forms, figures and their actions, whatsoever flavors and odors, and what sounds, touch, feelings and perceptions there are or that you can sense, know them all and their cause also to be the Supreme.

⁷⁵ You will be able to know your own soul, O good Rama, if you can see with the vision that lies between the looker and the object looked upon. ⁷⁶ Know it as uncreated and indestructible, without beginning or end. It is the eternal and everlasting Brahma and bliss itself. It is immaculate and infallible, highly adorable and without fault in its nature. It is beyond all description and a mere void in its form. It is the cause of causes and a notion of something that is unknowable. It is understanding and the inner faculty of the intellect or the mind.

Chapter 10 — The Emptiness upon Universal Dissolution Is Not Empty; Description of God

¹ Rama said, “That which remains after the universal dissolution is commonly designated by the term ‘formless void.’ ² Then how can you say that there was no void, light or darkness? ³ How could it be without the intellect and the living principle? How could the entities of the mind and understanding be lacking in it? ⁴ How could there be nothing and not all things? You have used other similar paradoxical expressions that have created much confusion in me.”

⁵ Vasishta said:—

You have raised a difficult additional question, Rama, but I shall have no difficulty to solve it, just like the sun is at no pains to dispel the darkness of night. ⁶ At the end of a great kalpa age when there remains that entity of God, it cannot be said to be a void, as I will now explain to you. Attend Rama and hear.

⁷ Like images carved in bas-relief upon a pillar, this world was made in relief upon that Entity. It cannot be said to have been a void. ⁸ Again, when there was the appearance of abundance under the name of the world, and be it real or unreal, it could not have been a void and empty.

⁹ As a pillar with carved or painted figures cannot be said to be devoid of them, so Brahma exhibiting the worlds contained in him can not become a void. ¹⁰ But the world contained in Brahma becomes both something and nothing, just like billows in calm waters may either exist or not exist. ¹¹ Again it happens that the hand of time marks certain figures in some places on some unconscious trees, and these marks are mistaken by people for images. So it comes to pass that certain figures of impermanent matter occur in the eternal mind which men mistake for the real world.

¹⁵ In answer to your second question, it has been said “and there was no darkness.” Because the divine light of Brahma (which existed before creation) is not like the light of a material luminary (which is followed by darkness). The everlasting light cannot be hidden by darkness, like sunshine or moonlight or the blazing of fire or the twinkling of stars or our eyes. ¹⁶ What we call darkness is the absence of light from the great celestial suns. God having no material property in his immaterial essence, there could be no such light or darkness with Him before creation.

¹⁹ As there is no difference between the outside and inside of a fruit, so there is no shade of difference between Brahma and the universe. ²⁰ As a wave is contained in and composed of water, and a clay pot of the earth, so the world being contained in Brahma, it can not be said to be null and void but is full of the spirit of God. ²¹ The comparison of earth and water does not agree physically with the spiritual essence of God, whose empty spirit contains and comprises the whole (vishwa, universe) within itself, as those elements have their component parts and productions. ²² Now, as the sphere of the intellect is far clearer and brighter than the spheres of air and empty space, so the sense and idea of the word “world” in the Divine Mind is clearer in a far greater degree than this visible world appears to us.

²³ (In answer to the third question with regard to the lack of intellect), it is said that like the pungency of pepper is perceived by one who tastes it and not by him who has never tasted it, so the minutiae of the Intellect are known in the intellectual sphere by a cultivated intelligence, and not by one who is without it.

³⁵ Without consciousness there is no life or understanding, no exercise of intellect, no organic action or sensation, and no mental desire or feeling whatever. ³⁶ Hence the Being that is full of these powers, and who is without decline or decay, is seen by us to be seated in His state of tranquil emptiness, and is more subtle than the rarefied vacuum of the ethereal regions.

³⁷ Rama said, “Tell me again and more precisely about the form of this transcendental Being who is of the nature of infinite intelligence so that I may have more light in my understanding.”

³⁸ Vasishtha said:—

I have told you repeatedly that there is one supreme Brahma, the cause of causes, who remains alone by Himself when the universe is finally dissolved or absorbed in Him. Listen to me describe Him fully to you.

⁴⁰ The yogi absorbed in meditation without awareness of the visible world or any sense of the viewer or the viewed, and who sees the light shining in himself, is the form of that Being. ⁴¹ He who has forgotten the nature of the individual soul (jiva) and his tendencies towards phenomena remains in the pure light and tranquil state of his consciousness and is the form of the Supreme Spirit. ⁴² He who does not feel wind or the touch of anything upon his body, but lives as a mass of intelligence in this life, is truly the form of the Supreme.

⁴⁷ The soul that is the witness to our knowledge of solar and visual lights and darkness, and is without beginning or end, is the form of the Supreme. ⁴⁸ He who manifests this world to us and keeps Himself hidden from view, be He the same or distinct from the world, is the form of the Supreme. ⁴⁹ He, though full of activity, is as sedate as a rock and who though not emptiness appears to be empty, such is the form of the Supreme.

⁵² The mind liberated from bodily activities and its dreaming, remaining concentrated in the consciousness abiding alike in all living as well as inert bodies, is said to remain in the end of our being. ⁵³ The intelligent mind that is as fixed as an immovable body and is freed from the exercise of its faculties can be compared to the Divine Mind.

Chapter 11 — There Can Be No Creation or Dissolution of Something that Never Existed

² Vasishta answered:—

Tell me, Rama, what is the form of the barren woman’s son? Where does he come from and where does he go? Tell me also, where does a castle in the sky come from and where does it go?

³ Rama replied, “There never was, nor is there, nor will there ever be a son of a barren woman, or a castle in the sky. Why do you ask me about the form and figure of something that is nothing?”

⁴ Vasishta said:—

As there never was a barren woman’s son or a city in the air, so there never existed any scene such as that of the world. ⁵ That which has no existence could not have come from anywhere, nor can it have its dissolution afterwards. So what can I tell you about its origin or demise?

⁶ Rama replied, “The son of a barren woman and a city in the sky are mere fictions, but the visible world is not so and it has both beginning and end.”

⁷ Vasishta replied:—

It is hard to have a comparison where the subject and object of the comparison agree in all respects. The world and its objects allow no comparison other than with themselves. ⁸ The appearance of the world is compared with that of a bracelet because the one is as false as the other. Neither is real. ⁹ And because there is nothing in the sky except negative emptiness, so the existence of the world in Brahma is only a negative idea. ¹⁰ As the black eye-liner collyrium is nothing other than blackness, and as there is no difference between frost and its coldness, so the world is not other than the great Brahma himself.

¹¹ As the property of coldness cannot be denied of the moon and frost, so one cannot describe creation as not being of God. (Literally, creation is not a negative property of Brahma, but essential to His nature.) ¹² As there is no water in a sea of the mirage, or light in the new moon, so this world, as it is (in its gross state) does not abide in the pure spirit of God.

¹³ That which did not exist owing to the lack of any cause has no present existence and cannot be destroyed. ¹⁴ How is it possible for a dull material object to have any cause other than a material one? In the same way it is not the light (but some solid substance) that is the cause of a shadow. ¹⁵ But as none of these works has come into existence without some cause, that cause, whatever it is, is displayed in what it produced. ¹⁶ Whatever appears as ignorance or illusion has some appearance of intelligence or truth, just like the illusion of the world seen in a dream displays the effect of consciousness within us. ¹⁷ Just like the illusion of the world in a dream is not without our inner consciousness of it, in the same way Brahma was not unconscious of the expansion of the world at the beginning of creation.

¹⁸ All that we see about us is situated in the Divine Soul. There is no other world that rises and sets (except what is imprinted in our minds).

²¹ Rama said, “If it is so, then tell me, O holy one, from where do we get our belief of its materiality? How is it that this unreal and visionary impression presents its baneful visible aspect to us? ²² If the view is in existence, there must be its viewer also, and when there is the viewer there is the view likewise. As long as either of these is in existence, there is our bondage. Our liberation chiefly depends on the disappearance of both (which can hardly take place). ²³ It is entirely impossible to be liberated as long as our notion of the view is not lost in our minds. Unless the view is vanished both from the vision of the eyes and mind, no one can even form an idea in his mind of liberation.”

²⁷ “Now sage, please use your reasoning to remove my hopelessness of liberation which, I imagine, is unattainable by any.”

²⁸ Vasishtha said:—

Hear me, Rama, explain to you at length how the unreal world with all its contents appears to us as real. ²⁹ For unless it is explained to you by my reasoning, stories and examples, this doubt will not subside in your breast like mud settles in a lake. ³⁰ Then Rama, you will be able to conduct yourself on earth as one assured that the creation and existence of the world are false concepts. ³¹ You will then remain like a rock against the impressions of wealth and poverty and of gain and loss, and whether your relation with anything is fleeting or lasting.

³² Know that there is that only one spirit which is self-existent. All else is mere fiction.

I will now tell you how the three worlds were produced and formed. ³³ It was from Him that all these beings have come to existence, while He of himself is all and everything in it. He likewise appears to us and disappears also, both as forms and their appearances, and as the mind and its faculties, and as figures and their shapes, and as modes and motions of all things.

Chapter 12 — Detailed Description of Original Creation, Elements in Their Subtle Forms

From the state of perfect stillness and tranquility of the supremely holy Spirit, the universe rose to being in the manner that you must hear with your best understanding and attention.

² As sound sleep displays itself in visionary dreams, so Brahma manifests Himself in the works of creation, of which He is the soul and receptacle. ³ The world, which of its nature is continually progressive in its course, is identical with the essence of that Being, whose form is selfsame with the indescribable glory of His eternally brilliant Intellect (chintamani, the wish-fulfilling jewel). ⁴ This Intellect (chit, cosmic consciousness), before assuming to itself consciousness or the knowledge of self, gets of itself and in itself an exercise of intellection (a thought). (This is the first stage in perception by the soul).

⁷ Lastly it takes the form of gross consciousness (ghana-samvedana) and receives the name of the individual soul (jiva as the living cosmic soul or Hiranyagarbha). It now loses its divine nature by reflecting on itself. ⁸ Then this living principle is involved in thoughts relating only to the world, but its nature depends on the divine essence (as the fallacy of the snake depends on the substance of the rope).

¹⁴ Sound is the seed (or root) of words that later became diverse in the forms of names or nouns and significant terms. Words evolved and became as numerous as shoots on trees, and as varied as inflected speech, sentences, and the collections of Vedas and other scriptures. ¹⁵ It is from this Supreme Spirit that all these worlds derived their beauty and the multitude of words (which sprang from the sounds), full of meaning, became widespread. ¹⁶ Consciousness expressed as this family of its offspring is described as the living individual soul (jiva) which afterwards became the source of all forms of beings known under a variety of expressions. ¹⁷ From this individual soul sprang the fourteen kinds of living beings that fill the cells in the bowels of all worlds.

¹⁸ It was then that Consciousness, by a motion and inflation of itself and as instantaneously as a thought, became the subtle-form element (tanmatra) of touch and feeling (the air), which was yet without name or action. This breath caused air, which expanded itself and filled all bodies that are objects of touch and feeling. ¹⁹ The air, which is the seed (root) of the tree of tangibles, then developed itself into branches composed of the various kinds of winds that cause breath and motion in all beings.

³¹ In this way the elements in their subtle forms (tanmatras) are produced in Consciousness out of its own volition and are manifested to sight in the form of formless minutiae. ³² These five-fold elements are only the seeds of all things in the world. They are seeds of the primary momentum that was given to them (in the beginning). To our way of thinking, they are the seeds of elementary bodies, but in their real nature, they are the uncreated ideal shapes of Consciousness replenishing the world.

Chapter 13 — On the Production of the Self-Born

Rama, when the Supreme Brahman remains in his resplendent and tranquil state (before creation), there is no essence of ethereal light or heat or even darkness produced in the intellectual spirit. (But they lie hidden there as if buried in oblivion).

² The Being (sat) that is God begins with the attribute of intellectuality (chetya). It is from the exercise of intellect (chetana, intuitive consciousness) of his intellectual part (chetiyansa) that the name of mind (chitta, the memory aspect of mind) is attributed to Him. The faculties (shakti, power) of his intellect (chit, universal consciousness) are called its intelligence (chetana, life, spirit, visible, conscious).

³ Cosmic Consciousness (chit) or Intellect, from its intelligence (chetana), then has the attribute of the individual, the individual soul (jiva) and connection with the intelligible objects in nature. Then when it is subject to intelligible objects, having a subtle, elemental form of the sense of individual self (aham matra), it can be named maya or illusion. ⁴ Then from the excess of its egoism (ahanta) that is full with the purposes of its mind and of the elements of sound and other sense objects, it has the attribute of understanding (buddhi, individual intelligence, the intuitive, faculty of direct intelligence controlling the sense organs, the organ of mind responsible for discrimination and judgment).

⁷ But the world is as continuous as a grove of karajna plants that grow from unsown seeds, and its elements of water, fire, earth and air have no regard for anybody (living or dead). ⁸ The Consciousness that is the soul of the universe creates the earth and all other things, like one remembers his dreams. ⁹ Wherever there is the germ of the world, it develops itself in that place. The live elements are the five-fold seed of the world, but the un-decaying Consciousness is the seed of the five-fold elements (pancha bhoota, i.e., earth, water, fire, air and space).

¹³ Again, that which is changeable in its form cannot have its sameness at all times. Therefore, if the substance of the five elements is attributed to Brahma, from an idea within the essence of His spirit, there can be no immaterial and unchanging Brahma. (I.e., Brahma would also have to be material and subject to change.) ¹⁴ Therefore know these five elements are the developed Brahma himself as he evolved them in the beginning, and he is their producer for the creation of the world. ¹⁵ He being the prime cause of their production, there is nothing that exists without him and the world is no product of itself.

²² As the soul continues to think of itself as a microcosm of the universe (vishwarupa), it falsely thinks itself to be within such reality, a thought expressed by “soham” (so am I). ²³ By thinking of himself this way, a man comes to believe it to be true, just like one believes himself to be a traveler in his dream. So by thinking the soul as a star (light body), he views it so within himself.

²⁷ Now this empty life composed of the essences of the mind — understanding and knowledge — resides in the hollow sheath of the star. ²⁸ It appears to me to take flight to the sky in order to see what is passing there. Then it enters the body by two holes which later are named the external organs (of sight). ²⁹ The organs by which the embodied individual soul is to see are called the eyes. That by which it feels is called the skin. Those whereby it hears are ears. ³⁰ The organ of smell is the nose, and that which conducts flavor to the spirit, the sense of taste, is the tongue. ³¹ Then there is breathing air — the breath of life — which moves the energies of the organs of action. It is this air which is the cause of vision and the mover of the internal organs of mind and thought. ³² Vital breath supports the body and the all supporting soul in the emptiness of the body, and fills and kindles it like air kindles a spark of fire.

³³ The word jiva or the individual soul has a figurative meaning: “something real in the unreal body.” Hence Brahma is said to be the life and soul of the unreal world. ³⁴ The gross embodied soul is in the form of emptiness, like the mind, yet it imagines itself to reside in an egg-shaped space inside the body, as Brahma is supposed to be seated in the cosmic egg. ³⁵ Some view the spirit of God as floating on the surface of the waters (in the form of Narayana). Others view it in the person of the Lord of creatures (Pashupati, Shiva). There are others who look at the spirit of God as infused throughout the creation in the figure of Viraj (the primordial man). These are called the subtle and gross bodies of the soul (sukshma and sthula sharira).

³⁶ The soul or spirit is the spacious womb of production. It is the means of executing its own purposes and of knowing the proper time and place. It is the article and the manner of action. ³⁷ The mind is the inventor of words, expressive of ideas (in the soul), and subjects itself to the arbitrary sounds of its own invention. Hence, in this world of errors, God is falsely said to be embodied in the words (shabda Brahma, the Brahma of speech, of Mimansa philosophy).

³⁸ The unproduced and self-born Brahma that has risen of himself (and represents the mind) is as unreal as a man dreaming he is flying in the sky. ³⁹ This all supporting and embodied soul is the creator Lord of Creatures who is said to have formed this illusory frame of the world. ⁴⁰ But in reality, nothing was formed or born, nor is there any substance to be found in the world. It is still the same empty form of Brahma whose essence is known to extend as the infinite space itself.

⁴⁴ The earth and all other existence are the eternal ideas of the Divine Mind. They appear to us to be objects in a dream that is our waking state. ⁴⁵ The Divine Spirit is known only as an emptiness, therefore the world must also be emptiness because like produces like. So all waters are liquid, though they are made to pass under different names.

⁴⁶ This creation is everywhere the same in the Supreme Spirit. It is only an evolution of the same and the Creator is always and everywhere unchanging in His nature. ⁴⁷ The empty universe, under the name of the cosmic egg, shines as clearly as the Divine Spirit. It is calm in its appearance and becomes disturbed by causes born in itself. ⁴⁸ It is supported by the unsupported Supporter of all who is one and without a second, but devoid of unity in creation. All this is born in His consciousness and therefore there is nothing new that is produced.

⁵² The idea of the fluidity of water allows our minds to form an image of a whirlpool. In the same way, the sight of the world produces the false notion of its reality in the mind. ⁵³ All unrealities become extinct at the end, as we see the death of our frail bodies in dreams. The essential part of our soul remains unscathed because of its own nature of indestructibility in the form of everlasting consciousness in the atmosphere of our intellects.

⁵⁴ Brahma, the prime Lord of creatures, is ever manifest by himself in the form of emptiness in the Supreme Spirit. He being of a spiritual form, like the mind, has no material body formed of earth or any other material. Therefore He is both real and unborn.

Chapter 14 — No Individual Souls, only One Brahma; Each Is Brahma; Brahma Creates the Rules and Delegates

In this manner the visible world, I, you, and all other things are nothing. Being unmade and unborn, they are nonexistent. It is only the Supreme Spirit that exists of itself.

¹⁰ Therefore, although Brahma has nothing that can be described, and has nothing that may be affirmed or denied about Him, yet He is the soul of everything that can be described. He is the source of these chains of living beings, just as light is the cause of a line of lighted lamps in illuminations.

¹⁴ Brahma himself is the prime soul of Viraj and is identical with him, and Viraj is the soul of creation and identical with it. He is the empty vitality of all, and it is from Him that the unreal earth and other things have their rise. (Viraj is the spirit of God diffused in nature.)

¹⁵ Rama said, “Tell me whether the individual soul is a limited thing or an unlimited mass of life? Or does the unbounded spirit of God exist in the shape of a mountainous heap of individual souls? ¹⁶ Are these individual souls like showers of rain falling from above, or like the drizzling drops of waves in the vast ocean of creation, or like the sparks of fire struck out of a red-hot iron? From where do they flow, and by whom are they emitted? ¹⁷ Sage, tell me the truth concerning the profusion of individual souls. Though I have a partial knowledge of it, I require your more complete and clear explanation.”

¹⁸ Vasishta replied:—

There is only one individual soul of the universe so you can not call it a multitude. Therefore your question is quite out of place, like a question about the horns of rabbits.

¹⁹ There are no detached individual souls, O Rama, nor are they to be found in multitudes anywhere, nor was there a mountainous heap of souls known to have existed at anytime. ²⁰ “Jiva”, the individual soul, is only a fictitious word with many more fictions heaped upon it, all of which, as you must know for certain, does not apply to the soul.

²³ They add the attributes of the living principle — understanding, action, motion, mind and unity and duality — to the soul as if these appertain to its nature. ²⁴ But all this is caused by ignorance, while right understanding assigns them to Brahma. The ignorant are bewildered by these different views of the soul, and they will not be awakened to sense. ²⁵ These different believers are lost in their various views like light is lost under darkness. They will never come to the knowledge of truth.

²⁸ Rama asked, “How is it, O holy one, that the totality of the individual souls in the world is guided by the will of one Universal Soul that governs the whole and to which all others are subject?”

Brahma, the great individual soul and omnipotent power, remained from eternity with his will to create without partition or alteration of himself. ³⁰ Whatever is wished by that great soul comes to take place immediately. The wish it first formed in its unity became a positive duality at last. Then its wish “to be many” became separate existences afterwards. ³¹ All these dualities of His self-divided powers (the different individual souls) had their several routines of action allotted to them, such as “this is for that,” meaning “this being is for that duty, and such action is for such end.” ³² Thus though there can be no act without effort (by the general rule as in the case of mortals), yet the predominant will of Brahma is always prevailing without effort to action.

³³ Though living beings effect their purposes by exertion of their energies, yet they can effect nothing without acting according to the law appointed by the predominant power. ³⁴ If the law of the predominant power is effective to attain an end, then the exertions of the subordinate powers (the individual souls) to that end must also be successful. ³⁵ Thus Brahma alone is the great individual soul that exists forever and without end, and these millions of living beings in the world are nothing other than agents of the divine energies.

³⁶ It is with a consciousness of the intellectual soul (the inner knowledge of God within themselves) that all individual souls are born in this world. But losing that consciousness (their knowledge of God) afterwards, they became alienated from him. ³⁷ Hence men of inferior souls should pursue the course of conduct led by superior souls in order to regain their spiritual life (atmajivatwam), just like copper becomes transformed into gold (by chemical process). ³⁸ Thus the whole body of living beings that had been as nonexistent as air before comes into existence and rises resplendent with wonderful intellect. ³⁹ Whoever perceives this wonderful intellect in his mind, then gets a body and the consciousness of his egoism, is said to be an embodied individual soul.

⁴³ The extent of the intellectual faculty is wider and more rarefied than the surrounding air, yet it perceives its distinct egoism by itself and of its own nature. ⁴⁴ Its knowledge of self springs of itself in itself like water in a fountain. It perceives itself (its ego) to be only an atom amidst endless worlds. ⁴⁵ It also perceives in itself the beautiful and wonderful world which is amazing to understanding and which thereafter is named the universe.

⁴⁶ Now Rama, our egoism, being only a conception of the intellect, is a mere fiction (kalpana). The elementary principles being only creatures of egoism, they are also fictions of the intellect. ⁴⁷ Again the individual soul being only a result of our acts and desires, you have to renounce these causes in order to get rid of your knowledge of “I” and “you” and then, after discarding the fictions of the real and unreal, you attain to the knowledge of the true One.

⁵³ Know that the world is the mind (chitta) of the consciousness (chit) of God because mind does not exist without the world. If the world did not exist, that would prove that the mind and consciousness, which consist of the world, do not exist. (Therefore, the intelligent world is identical to the mind and intellect of God.)

⁶⁸ The world is in motion by the force of Consciousness in whose great emptiness it is settled. The world is lighted by the light of that Consciousness, and is therefore said to both exist and not exist by itself. ⁶⁹ Like the emptiness of that Intellect, the world is said now to exist and now to be nonexistent. Like the light of that Intellect, the world now appears and now disappears from view. ⁷⁰ Like the fleeting wind breathed by that Intellect, the world is now in existence and now nonexistent. Like the cloudy and unclouded sphere of that Intellect, the world is now in being and now not in being. ⁷¹ Like the broad daylight of that Intellect, the world is now in existence, and like the disappearance of that light, it now becomes nothing. It is formed of the active (rajas) quality of the Intellect, like black collyrium eyeliner made from particles of oil.

⁷² It is Intellectual fire that gives warmth to the world. It is the alabaster of the Intellect that causes its whiteness. The rock of Intellect gives it hardness, and its water causes its fluidity. ⁷³ The sweetness of the world is derived from the sugar of the Intellect, and its juiciness from the milk in the Divine Mind. Its coldness is from the ice, and its heat from the fire contained in the same. ⁷⁴ The world is oily by the mustard seeds contained in Consciousness and billowy in the sea of the Divine Mind. It is sweet by the honey and golden by the gold contained in the same. ⁷⁵ The world is a fruit of the tree of Consciousness and its fragrance is derived from the flowers growing in the tree of the mind. It is the existence of Consciousness that gives the world its being, and it is the mold of the Eternal Mind that gives its form.

⁷⁸ Shame on those who deride ideas as false talk because the world — with its hills, and seas, earth and rivers — is all untrue without the idea of God’s presence in it. ⁷⁹ Consciousness being an unity cannot be mistaken for a part of anything. Though it may become as solid as a stone, yet it shines brightly in the sphere of its emptiness. ⁸⁰ It has a clear empty space in its inside, like a transparent crystal, that reflects the images of all objects, though it is as clear as the sky. ⁸¹ As the lines on the leaves of trees are neither parts of the leaves nor distinct from them, so the world situated in Consciousness is not part of it or separate from it.

⁸² No detached soul is a varied growth, but retains in its nature the nature of consciousness, and Brahma is the primary cause of causes. ⁸³ The mind is of its own nature a causal principle, by reason of its idea of the Intellect, but its existence is hard to prove when it is insensible and unconscious of the Intellect. ⁸⁴ Whatever is in the root comes out in the tree, just as we see seeds shoot forth in plants of its own species.

Valmiki speaking:—

Chapter 15 — Story of Leela and Saraswati (Padma's Body on the Shrine)

The world is a void and as null as the pearls in the sky (seen by optical delusion). It is as unreal as the soul in the emptiness of consciousness. ² All its objects appear like un-engraved images on the column of the mind that is without any engraving or engraver.

¹⁵ The universe is the sphere of the spirit of God in infinite space. It has no foundation elsewhere except in that Spirit of which it is only a particle filling a space equal to a bit of infinity. ¹⁶ It is as transparent as the sky and without any solidity at all. It is as empty as empty air and like a city pictured in imagination.

¹⁸ Rama said, "Tell me at once, O holy one, the long and short of the story of the temple, which will help my understanding of these things."

¹⁹ Vasishtha said:—

In the past, on the surface of the earth, there lived a king named Padma (Lotus) because he was like the blooming and fragrant lotus of his race. Padma was equally blessed with wisdom, prosperity and good children. ²⁰ He observed the bounds of his duties, just as the sea preserves the boundaries of countries. He destroyed the mist of his adversaries, like the sun dispels the darkness of night. He was like the moon to his lotus-like queen, and like burning fire to the hay of evils and crimes.

²¹ He was the asylum of the learned, like Mount Meru is the residence of the gods. He was the moon of fair fame risen from the ocean of the earth. He was like a lake to the geese of good qualities, and like the sun to the lotuses of purity. ²² In warfare, he was like a blast to the vines of his antagonists. He was like a lion to the elephants (desires) of his mind. He was the favorite of all learning, a patron of the learned, and a mine of all admirable qualities. ²³ He stood fixed like Mount Mandara after it had churned the ocean of the demons. He was like spring season to the blossoms of joy, and like the god of the floral bow to the flowers of blooming prosperity. ²⁴ He was the gentle breeze to the shimmering of playful vines, and like the god Vishnu in his valor and energy. He shone like the moon on the florets of good manners, and like wildfire to the brambles of licentiousness.

³⁰ Leela was like a second Rati born to serve her lord. Padma was Kama in person on earth to give joy to all souls. ³¹ She was sorry at his sorrow and delighted to see him delightful. She was thoughtful to see him pensive. Thus she was an exact picture of her lord, except that she was afraid to find him angry.

Chapter 16 — The Lives of Queen Leela & King Padma; Leela Performs Tapas to Saraswati; Padma's Death

¹⁸ The loving and beloved Queen Leela, being thus brought up in pleasure and indulgence, at one time thought within herself with a wistful heart, ¹⁹ "How will my lord and ruler of earth, who is in the bloom of youth and prosperity and who is dearer to me than my life, be free from old age and death?"

²⁰ And how will I enjoy his company on beds of flowers in the palace, possessed of my youth and free-will, for long, long hundreds of years? ²¹ Therefore I will endeavor with all my vigilance, prayers, austerities and efforts to know how this moon-faced prince may become free from death and decline. ²² I will ask the most knowing, the most austere, and the very learned brahmins how men may evade death.”

³¹ She kept her fasts and broke them at the end of every third night. She entertained the gods, brahmins, priests and holy people with feasts and due honors. ³² She performed her daily ablutions, she distributed alms, and she practiced austerities and meditation. In all of these she was painstakingly observant of the rules of pious devotion. ³³ She also attended to her unaware husband at the stated times. To the utmost, she took care of him and performed her duties as required by law and custom.

³⁹ “The one is that after my husband is dead, his soul may not go beyond the precincts of this shrine in the inner apartment. ⁴⁰ The second is that whenever I call you, you shall hear my prayer, appear before me, and give me your sight and blessing.”

⁴⁴ The perceptions of King Padma entered into his subtle body and in a short time, he looked as dry as a withered leaf without its juicy gloss. ⁴⁵ The dead body of the warlike king was laid over a tomb inside the palace. Queen Leela began to fade away at its sight, like a lotus flower without the waters of its birth.

Chapter 17 — Leela Sees Padma and His Court in the Spirit World, Checks Her Own Court to Make Sure It Still Exists

¹ Saraswati said, “My child, move the dead body of your husband over to that shrine, strew those flowers over it, and you shall have your husband again. ² Never will this body rot or fade as long as the flowers are fresh over it. Know that your husband will shortly return to life again. ³ His individual soul, pure as air, will never leave this cemetery of your inner apartment.”

⁹ Leela answered, “Tell me goddess, where does my husband reside at present? What has he been doing? Take me to his presence, as I am unable to bear the load of my life without him.”

¹² “As in passing from one place to another you are conscious of standing in between, so you will instantly arrive at the intermediate region of the mental world (lying between the physical and spiritual worlds). ¹³ If, after forsaking all your mental desires, you abide in the spiritual world you will certainly come to the knowledge of that spiritual Being who comprehends all in Himself. ¹⁴ It is only by your knowledge of the non-existence of the world that you can come to know the positive existence of that Being, as you will now be able to do by my grace, and by no other means whatever.”

¹⁵ Vasishta said:—

So saying, the goddess repaired to her heavenly seat and Leela sat gladly in her mood of steadfast meditation. ¹⁶ Within a moment, she left the prison house of her body. Her soul broke out of its inner bound of the mind to fly freely in the air, like a bird freed from its cage. ¹⁷ She ascended to the airy region of Consciousness and saw her husband sitting there amidst a group of princes and rulers of the earth.

sages, saints, brahmins and rishis at the eastern entrance of the hall. ²⁰ At the southern porch stood a throng of princes and chiefs of men without number, and standing at the western doorway, a bevy of young ladies. ²¹ The northern gateway was blocked by lines of horses, carriages and elephants.

A guard advanced and informed the king of a war in the Deccan. ²² He said that the Karnatic chief had attacked the eastern frontier, and that the chieftain of Surat had subjugated the barbarous tribes on the north, and that the ruler of Malwa had besieged the city of Tonkan on the west.

⁴⁵ The royal servants rose up at her call and obedient to her command they said, “Be it so” and attended to their respective duties. ⁴⁶ A group of staff-bearers ran to all sides to call the courtiers from the city, and sweepers came and swept the ground as clean as if the sun had shed his rays upon it. ⁴⁷ A better set of servants cleaned the courtyard as clean as autumn days clear the sky of its rainy clouds. ⁴⁸ Rows of lights were placed about the courtyard, which looked as beautiful as clusters of stars in the clear sky. ⁴⁹ Throngs of people filled the courtyard, like the ancient earth had been covered by the floods of the great deluge.

Chapter 18 — Leela Wonders which World Is Real; Saraswati Explains

¹⁸ The goddess replied, “Real creation cannot produce an unreal figure. A similar cause cannot produce a dissimilar effect.”

²¹ “Say, O beautiful maiden, what were the causes of your husband being born in this earth? The same led to his birth in the other world also. ²² When the soul has fled from here, how can the material earth follow him and what auxiliary causes can there be in connection with this cause? ²³ Whenever there is a contributing cause in addition to the apparent cause, everyone usually attributes the result to some unknown prior cause or motive.”

²⁶ Leela said, “Yes I find memory to be an airy thing, and its reproduction of my husband and all other things within me are only empty shadows in the mind.”

²⁹ The goddess replied, “As this illusionary world appeared a reality to you before you had memories of it, so you must know that all this is unreal from what I am going to relate to you.”

Saraswati speaking:—

The blue skies above and below are like the soot of this house, beset by bodies of departed spirits resembling groups of gnats buzzing in the air. ³⁴ The fleeting clouds are the smoke of this house or like spider webs in its corners, and the hollow air is full of aerial spirits, like holes of bamboos filled with flies. ³⁵ There are also the playful spirits of gods and demigods hovering over human houses like swarms of busy, buzzing bees about vessels of honey. ³⁶ Here and there, amidst the cavity of heaven, earth and the infernal regions, lay tracts of land well watered by rivers, lakes and the sea on all sides.

³⁷ In a corner of this land was a secluded piece of ground sheltered by hills and crags about it. ³⁸ In this secluded spot sheltered by hills, rivers and forests, there lived a holy brahmin man with his wife and children, free from disease and care of gain and fear of a ruler. He passed his days in his fire-worship and hospitality with the produce of his cattle and lands.

Chapter 19 — Story of a Former Vasishta & Arundhati

Vasishta relating the story of Leela, Saraswati speaking to Leela:—

His wife was Arundhati, fair as the moon and like the star of the same name visible from earth. ³ She resembled her namesake, the priestess of the solar race, in her virtues and parts and in all things, except in her soul and body. ⁴ She passed her time in true love and affection in the company of her husband, and she was his all in the world, with her sweet smiling face resembling a kumuda flower.

amidst the rushing winds of business on all sides. He was like the sun expanding the lotus-like hearts of the virtuous. To the eyes of women he was like the god Kama. ²³ He was the model of all learning, and the all giving wish-fulfilling tree to his suitors. He was the footstool of great scholars. He was like the full moon shedding ambrosial beams of enlightened rule all around.

²⁸ The houses, lands and all the immovable properties and movable riches of this holy brahmin Vasishta still exist in that rocky village, and it has been only eight days since the souls of this loving pair were reunited in the hollow vault of their house.

Chapter 20 — Saraswati Explains Leela's Former Life as Arundhati

² You two are the same pair now reigning over this realm, resembling a pair of doves in your nuptial love, and the gods Shiva and Parvati in your might.”

⁶ Vasishta said:—

Hearing these words of the goddess, Leela was confused in her mind, and with her eyes staring with wonder, she addressed her softly.

⁷ Leela said, “How is it, O goddess, that your words are so incoherent with truth. You make us the same as the brahmin couple who are in their own house. We are sitting here in our palace. ⁸ How is it possible that the small space of the room in which my husband's body is lying could contain those spacious lands and hills and the ten sides of the sky? ⁹ It is as impossible as confining an elephant in a mustard seed, or a gnat fighting with a body of lions in a nutshell. ¹⁰ It is as incredible as to believe a lotus seed contains a hill, or to be devoured by a little bee, or that peacocks are dancing hearing the roaring of clouds in a dream. ¹¹ O great goddess of gods, it is equally improbably to say that this earth, with all its mountains and other things, is contained within the small space of a sleeping room. ¹² Therefore, O goddess, please explain this mystery clearly to me, because it is by your favor only that the learned are cleared of their questions.”

¹³ The goddess Saraswati said:—

Hear me, fair maiden! I did not tell you a lie. Transgression of the law is a thing unknown to us. (The law is nanritam vadeta — never tell an untruth.) ¹⁴ It is I who established the law when others are about to break it. If I should slight the law, who else is there who would observe it?

¹⁵ The individual soul of the village brahmin saw within itself and in his own house the image of this great kingdom, just as his departed spirit now sees the same in its empty void. (Therefore both these states are equally ideal.) ¹⁶ After death you lost the memories of your former lives, just like one loses memories of waking events when in the dream state. ¹⁷ All are like the appearance of the three worlds in dream, or their formation in the imagination, or like the description of warfare in an epic poem, or like water in the mirage of a sandy desert. ¹⁸ The hills and houses seen in the empty space of the brahmin's house were nothing but the capacity of his own mind to form the images of its fancy and receive the external impressions like a reflecting mirror. ¹⁹ All these, though unreal, appear as real substances on account of the reality of consciousness which is seated in the cavity of the innermost sheath of the body and reflects the images. ²⁰ But these images derived from the memories of unreal objects of the world are as unreal as those objects which cast their reflections upon consciousness.

Waves rising in the river of a mirage are as unreal as the mirage itself.

²¹ Know that this chair sitting in this room of your house, as well as myself and yourself and everything else about us, are only the reflections of our consciousness, without which nothing would be perceptible. ²² Our dreams and fallacies, our desires and fancies, and also our notions and ideas serve as the best evidence to understand this truth (that nothing is true beside the subjective mind, which creates and forms, produces and presents all objects to our view).

²⁷ Leela asked, “How can we be the brahmin couple when they died only eight days before and we have been reigning here for so many years?”

²⁸ The goddess replied:—

In reality, there is neither any limit of space or time, nor any distance of place or length of time. Hear me now tell you the reason why.

²⁹ As the universe is the reflection of the Divine Mind, so are infinity and eternity but representations of Himself. ³⁰ Listen to what I tell you about how we form the idea of time and its subdivisions, whether a moment or an age. It is the same way that we make distinctions among the individuals that are me, you and this or that person.

³¹ As soon as one feels the lack of senses after his death, he forgets his former nature and thinks himself to be another being. ³² Then, in the twinkling of an eye, he assumes an empty form in the womb of emptiness and in that container he thinks within himself, ³³ “This is my body with its hands and feet.” Thinking about body, he finds it presented before him. ³⁴ Then he thinks in himself, “I am the son of this father and am so many years old. These are my dear friends and this is my pleasant home. ³⁵ I was born and became a boy, and then grew up to this age. There are all my friends and in the same course of their lives.” ³⁶ Thus the compact density of the sphere of his soul presents him with many other images that appear to arise in it as in some part of the world. ³⁷ But they neither rise nor remain in the soul itself, which is as transparent as empty air. They appear to consciousness like a vision seen in a dream.

⁵¹ It was in this way that in times past, King Harish Chandra thought one night to be twelve years. One day seems like a year to those who are separated from their beloved objects. ⁵² Again, it is all false, whether the birth or death of someone in his dream, or being born and recognizing a father in infancy, or a hungry man imagining he is dining on dainty food. ⁵³ So who would believe a satisfied man after eating who says he is starving, or one who declares that he is an eyewitness of something he had not seen, or an empty space full of people, or that someone found lost treasure in his dream?

Chapter 21 — Saraswati Explains the Practice of Meditation, Astral Travel

Saraswati continues speaking to Leela:—

⁹ According to some, those visible worlds are said to have remained in their ideal state in the Divine Mind. According to others, there were no pre-existent notions of these in the mind of God. ¹⁰ According to some others, the world manifested itself not from memory but by the power and will of God. Still others maintain it to be the production of a sudden, fortuitous combination of intelligence and atomic principles (kakataliya sanyoga).

¹¹ Completely forgetting the world is called liberation. That cannot be had if consciousness is attached to what is desirable or is averse to the undesirable. ¹² It is difficult to effect an entire negation of both one's subjective and objective knowledge of his self and the existence of the outer world. Yet nobody can be freed without the obliteration of both.

¹³ As the fallacy of taking a rope for a snake is not removed until the meaning of the word snake is known to be inapplicable to the rope, so no one can have rest and peace of mind unless he is convinced of the illusory nature of the world. ¹⁴ Even with that, a person who is at peace with himself cannot be wholly at rest without divine knowledge because, even though he has rid himself of the devil of worldliness, the ghost of his inner ignorance may overtake him. ¹⁵ The world is certainly a monster in itself without the knowledge of its Author, but the difficulty of knowing the First Cause has rendered it an impassable wilderness.

¹⁶ Leela said, "If memories are the cause of one's reincarnation, then, O goddess, tell me what were the causes of the birth of the brahmin couple, without the vestiges of their past memories?"

¹⁷ The goddess replied:—

Know that Brahma the first progenitor of mankind, who was absolute in himself, did not retain any vestige of his past memories in him. ¹⁸ The first born, who had nothing to remember of a prior birth, was born in the lotus with his own intelligence (chaitanya) and not because of his memory. ¹⁹ The Lord of Creatures being thus born by chance of his own genius or creative power, and without any assignable cause or design on his part, reflected within himself, “Now I am become another and the source of creation.”

²⁰ Whatever is born of itself is like a nothing that was never produced at all, but remains as the absolute intellect itself in the clouds (chinnabhas). ²¹ The Supreme Being is the sole cause of both types of memories (those caused by vestiges of prior impressions, and those produced by prior desires). Both conditions of cause and effect are combined in Him in the sphere of his consciousness. ²² Therefore our tranquility can only come from knowing that cause and effect are the same and that the auxiliary cause is in Him.

²⁵ Leela said, “What a wonderful sight you have shown me, O goddess. It is as auspicious as morning light and as brilliant as lightning. ²⁶ Now goddess, please satisfy my curiosity until I become thoroughly familiar with this knowledge through my intense application and study. ²⁷ Kindly take me to that that mountainous place where the brahmin couple, Vasishtha and Arundhati, lived and show me their house.”

²⁸ The goddess replied:—

If you want to see that sight, you have to be immaculate. You must give up your personality and your ego-sense and attain awareness of the unintelligible Consciousness within the soul. ²⁹ Then you will find yourself in an empty atmosphere situated in the sky that resembles the prospects of earthly men and the apartments of the firmament (i.e., nothing). ³⁰ In this state we shall be able to see them (the field of another’s imagination) with all their possessions and without any obstruction. Otherwise this body is a great barrier in the way of spiritual vision.

³¹ Leela said, “Tell me kindly, O goddess, the reason why do we not see the other world with these eyes, or go there with these our bodies.”

³² The goddess replied:—

The reason is that you take the true future as false, and you believe the untrue present as true. These worlds that are formless appear to your eyes as having forms, just like you see the form of a ring when its substance is gold. ³³ Gold, though fashioned into a circle, has no curve in it. The spirit of God appearing in the form of the world is not the world itself. ³⁴ The world is an emptiness full with the spirit of God. Whatever is visible is like dust appearing to fly over the sea.

³⁶ The believer in Brahma sees Brahma alone and no other anywhere. He looks to Brahma through Brahma himself, as the creator and preserver of all, and whose nature includes all other attributes in itself. ³⁷ Brahma is known not only as the author of His work of the creation of worlds, but as existent of himself without any causation or auxiliary causation.

⁴² Without the practice of meditation, you cannot approach God with your mortal frame. A soul sullied by physical sensation can never see the image of God. ⁴³ It is impossible for one to arrive at another's castle in the sky, when he is unable to see the castle in the sky that he himself imagined.

⁴⁴ Therefore, give up your gross body and assume your light intellectual frame. Immerse yourself in the practice of yoga so that you may see God face to face. ⁴⁵ It is possible to labor and build castles in the air. In the same way, it is possible through the practice of yoga, and in no other way, to behold God, either with this body or without it.

⁴⁶ Ever since the creation of this world (by the will of Brahma), there have been false conceptions of its existence. It has been attributed to an eternal fate, niyati (by fatalists), and to an illusory power, maya shakti (of Maya vadis).

⁴⁷ Leela asked, "O goddess, you said that we both shall go to the abode of the brahmin couple, but I ask you, how is that possible? ⁴⁸ I am able to go there with the pure essence of my sentient soul. But tell me, how will you who are pure intellect (chetas) go to that place?"

⁴⁹ The goddess replied:—

I tell you lady, Divine Will is an aerial tree and its fruits are as unsubstantial as air, having no figure or form or substance to them. ⁵⁰ Whatever is formed by the will of God from the pure essence of His intelligent nature is only a likeness of Himself and bears little difference from its original. ⁵¹ My body is the same and I need not lay it aside. I find that place with my body like a breeze finds odors. ⁵² As water mixes with water, fire with fire, and air with air, so does this spiritual body easily join with any material form that it likes. ⁵³ But a physical body cannot mix with a non-physical substance, nor can a solid rock become the same as the idea of a hill.

⁵⁴ Your body has its mental and spiritual parts. It has become physical because of its habitual tendency towards the physical. ⁵⁵ Your physical body becomes spiritual (ativahika) by leaning towards spirituality, as in your sleep, your protracted meditation, and your unconsciousness to fancies and reveries. ⁵⁶ Your spiritual nature will return to your body when your earthly desires are lessened and curbed within the mind.

⁵⁷ Leela said, "Say goddess, what happens to the spiritual body after it has attained its compactness by constant practice of yoga? Does it become indestructible or does it perish like all other finite bodies?”

⁵⁸ The goddess replied:—

Anything that exists is perishable and, of course, liable to death. But how can something die that is nothing and is imperishable in its nature? ⁵⁹ Again, once we realize the mistake of thinking a rope to be a snake, the snake disappears of itself and no one mistakes the rope anymore. ⁶⁰ Thus, as the true knowledge of the rope removes the false conception of the snake in it, so the recognition of the spiritual body dispels the misconception of its materiality. ⁶¹ All imagery is at an end when there is no image at all, just like the art of carving statues must cease if there is no more stone.

⁶⁴ Leela asked, “But how can imagination trace out anything in that unity in which the divisions of time and space and all things are lost in an undistinguishable mass?”

⁶⁵ The goddess replied:—

Like the bracelet in gold, waves in water, the show of truth in dreams, and the appearance of castles in the sky ⁶⁶ all vanish upon an accurate perception, so the imaginary attributes of the unpredictable God are all nothing whatever. ⁶⁷ Just like there is no dust in the sky, no attribute or partial property can be ascribed to God whose nature is indivisible and unimaginable, who is an unborn unity, tranquil and all-pervading. ⁶⁸ Whatever shines about us is the pure light of that Being who scatters His luster all around like a transcendental gem.

⁶⁹ Leela said, “If it is so at all times, then tell me, O goddess, how did we happen to fall into the error of attributing duality and diversity to His nature?”

⁷⁰ The goddess replied:—

It was your ignorance that for so long has led you to error. The natural bane of mankind is the absence of reasoning, and it requires remedying by your attending to reason. ⁷¹ When reason takes the place of ignorance, in a moment it introduces the light of knowledge in the soul instead of its former darkness. ⁷² As reason advances, your ignorance and your bondage to prejudice are put to flight. Then you have an unobstructed liberation and pure understanding in this world. ⁷³ As long as you remained without reasoning on this subject, you were either sleeping or wandering in error.

⁷⁴ Now your reason and liberation are awakened and the seeds for the suppression of your desires are sown in your heart. ⁷⁵ At first, the nature of this physical world was neither apparent to you nor you to it. How long will you reside in it and what other desires have you here? ⁷⁶ Withdraw your mind from its thoughts of the viewer, the visible, and the vision of this world. Settle your mind on the idea of the entire negation of all existence. Fix your meditation solely upon the Supreme Being and sit in a state of unalterable unconsciousness. ⁷⁷ When the seed of renunciation has taken root and germinated in your heart, the sprouts of your likes and dislikes will be destroyed of themselves. ⁷⁸ Then the impression of the world will be utterly effaced from the mind and an unshaken anesthesia will overtake you all at once.

⁷⁹ Remaining entranced in your abstract meditation, in process of time you will have a soul as luminous as a star in the clear sky of heaven, free from the links of all causes and their effects for evermore.

Chapter 22 — Practice of Wisdom (Vijnana-Bhyasa)

Objects seen in a dream prove to be false on being awoken. Similarly, belief in the reality of the body becomes unfounded upon dissolution of our desires. ² As a thing dreamt of disappears upon waking, so does the waking body disappear in sleep, when desires lie dormant in the soul.

³ As our physical bodies awake after dreaming and desiring, so our spiritual bodies awake after we cease to think of our physical states. ⁴ In deep sleep we are devoid of desires. Similarly, in the state of renunciation, even though we are awake in our physical bodies, we have the tranquility of liberation. ⁵ The desire of men liberated while living (jivan mukta) is not properly any desire at all. It is a pure desire relating to universal wellbeing and happiness.

¹¹ When your sense of individual ego is moderated by your practice of meditation, then the perception of invisible will rise of itself clearly before your mind. ¹² When spiritual knowledge gains a firm footing in your mind, you will perceive more other worlds than you expect. ¹³ Therefore, O blameless lady, try your utmost to deaden your desires. When you have gained sufficient strength in that practice, know yourself to be liberated in this life.

¹⁴ When the moon of your intellectual knowledge shines fully with its cooling beams, you shall have to leave your physical body here in order to see the other worlds. ¹⁵ Your fleshy body has no tangible connection with one that is without flesh, nor can the intellectual body (lingadeha, astral body) perform any action of the physical system.

¹⁶ I have told you all this according to my best knowledge and the state of things as they are. Even children know that what I say is as effective as the curse or blessing of a god.

¹⁸ Nobody believes that he has a spiritual body, even at his death bed, but everyone thinks a dying man is dead with his body forever. ¹⁹ This body however, neither dies nor is it alive at anytime. Both life and death, in all respects, are mere appearances of aerial dreams and desires. ²⁰ The life and death of beings here below are as false as the appearances and disappearance of people in imagination, or dolls in play or puppet shows.

²¹ Leela said, “O goddess, the pure knowledge that you have given me has fallen on my ears acts like a healing balm to the pain caused by phenomena. ²² Now tell me the name and nature of the practice for spiritualization. How it is to be perfected and what is the end of such perfection?"

²³ The goddess replied:—

Whatever a man attempts to do here at anytime, he can hardly ever complete it without painful practice to the utmost of his power. ²⁴ The wise say that practice consists in the association of one thing with another, in understanding it thoroughly, and in devoting oneself solely to his object.

²⁹ The effect of practicing meditation is a strong tendency of the soul towards the spirit of God, which results from an understanding of the non-existence of the visible world and the subsidence of passions. ³⁰ But mere knowledge of the nonexistence of the world, without subduing passions, is known as knowledge without practice, and is of no value to its possessor. ³¹ Consciousness of the non-existence of the visible world is the true knowledge of the knowable. The practice of meditation makes this knowledge a habit in the mind and leads one to his final extinction (nirvana). ³² The practice of meditation prepares the mind and awakens the intelligence which lay dormant in the dark night of this world. Consciousness then sheds its cooling showers of reason, like dew drops in the frosty night of autumn.

Valmiki speaking:—

³³ As the sage was lecturing in this manner, the day departed for its evening service and led the assembled train to their evening prayers. After the rising beams of the sun dispelled the darkness of night, they met again with mutual greetings.

Chapter 23 — Saraswati & Leela Meditate & Begin Astral Travel

After this conversation between Goddess Saraswati and the excellent Leela on that night, the two of them found Leela's family and attendants fast asleep in the inner apartment. ² Saraswati and Leela entered the shrine that was closely shut on all sides by latches fastened to the doors and windows, and which was perfumed with the fragrance of heaps of flowers. ³ They sat beside the corpse decorated with fresh flowers and garments. Their faces shone like the fair full moon and brightened the place. ⁴ They stood motionless on the spot, as if they were sculptures engraved on marble columns, or pictures drawn upon the wall.

Chapter 24 — Description of the Astral Journey

Thus ascending higher and higher, and by degrees reaching the highest station, they continued viewing the heavens with their hands clasped together.

They saw emptiness full of great and wonderful works. ¹⁰ They saw what they had never seen before, the tremendous depth of the void that was not filled up by the myriads of worlds which kept revolving in it. ¹¹ Over and over and higher and higher, they saw the celestial spheres filled with luminous orbs adorned with their ornamental stars wandering one above and around the other. ¹² Huge mountainous bodies like Mount Meru moved about in empty space and emitted a reddish glare on all sides, like a flame of fire from within their bowels. ¹³ There were beautiful tablelands, like those of the Himalayas, with their pearly peaks of snow. There were mountains of gold spreading a golden color over the land. ¹⁴ In one place they saw mountains of emerald tinting the landscape with a lush green like a field of fresh grass. In other places they saw some dark cloud dimming the sight of the spectator and hiding the spectacle in dark blackness. ¹⁵ They saw also tracts of blue sapphire with vines of parijata flowers blooming like banners in the blue skies.

they saw the rulers of men and lines of female nature spirits (apsaras) hurrying up and down the air. In others, they saw goddesses wandering amidst the smoky and fiery clouds in the firmament. ²² Here they saw some sparks of light falling like the jewels of celestial nymphs in their hurried flight to their respective spheres. There they saw the light spirits of lesser masters dwindling into darkness.

They saw some monsters also, such as dakinis heaving their heads in the forms of huge surges in the cloudy ocean of the sky. ²⁵ There were bodies of yoginis too, their faces resembling those of dogs, ravens, asses and camels, who were traversing the wide expanse of the heavens to no purpose. ²⁶ There were masters and nature spirits sporting in pairs in the dark, smoky and ash colored clouds that spread the four quarters of the skies.

there were valleys and caves covered in eternal darkness.⁴⁴ In one place there was a vast inextinguishable fire, like that of the blazing sun, and in another, a thick frost covering the moonlight.

⁵⁸ Moonbeams shone brightly in one spot, and sweet cooling breezes blew softly in another. Hot sultry winds were blowing in some place, singeing the forest on mountainous clouds.

Chapter 25 — Description of Astral Travel over the Earth

Vasishtha speaking:—

¹ Then these ladies in their forms of intelligence alighted from the sky and, passing over the mountainous regions, saw the houses of men on the surface of the earth. ² They saw the world appearing like a lotus in the heart of Nara (the primeval Man or eternal Spirit pervading the universe). Its eight sides form the flower petals, the hills its pistils, and the center contains its sweet flavor. ³ The rivers are the tubes of its filaments, covered with drops of snow resembling their pollen. Days and nights roll over it like swarms of black-bees and butterflies, and all its living beings appear like gnats fluttering about. ⁴ Its long stalks, white as bright daylight, are composed of fibers serving for food, and of tubes conducting the drink to living beings. ⁵ It is wet with moisture, sucked by the sun, resembling a swan swimming about in the air. In the darkness of night and absence of the sun, it folds itself in sleep.

¹⁷ Beyond that and double its size is Kusadwipa continent, full of population. It is also circular and surrounded by another sea, ¹⁸ the belt of the sea of curds, delectable to the gods and double the size of the continent it encircles. ¹⁹ After that lies the circle of Krauncha continent, also twice the size of the former one and surrounded by a sea like a canal surrounds a city. ²⁰ This sea is called the sea of butter and is twice as large as the continent it surrounds. Beyond it lies Salmali continent surrounded by the foul sea of wine. ²¹ The fair belt of this sea resembles a wreath of white flowers, like the girdle of the Sesha serpent forming the necklace hanging on the breast of Vishnu. ²² Thereafter stretches Plaxa continent, double the size of the former and surrounded by the belt of the sea of sugar that appears like the snowy plains of Himalaya. ²³ After that lies the belt of Pushkara continent, twice as large as the preceding one and encircled by a sea of sweet water double its circumference.

After the excellent ladies had returned from their visit of physical sphere, they entered the house where the holy brahmin used to live.

² There the holy ladies, unseen by anyone, saw the tomb of the brahmin. ³ The maid servants were dejected with sorrow, and the faces of the women were soiled with tears, faded like lotuses with their withered leaves. ⁴ All joy had fled from the house, leaving it like the dry bed of the dead sea after its waters were sucked. It was like a garden parched in summer, or a tree struck by lightning. ⁵ It was as joyless as a dried lotus torn by a blast or withering under frost; and as faint as the light of a lamp without its wick or oil; and as dim as the eyeball without its light. ⁶ The house without its master was as sad as the face of a dying person, or like a forest with its falling and withered leaves, or like dry and dusty ground for lack of rain.

²¹ The goddesses addressed him gently, "Tell us the cause of your sorrow which has made you all so sad."

²² Then, one by one, Jyeshtha Sarma and others described their sorrows owing to the death of the brahmin couple. ²³ They said, “Know, O goddess pair, there lived here a brahmin and his wife who had been the support of guests and a model for brahmins. ²⁴ They were our parents who recently died. They have abandoned us, leaving all their friends and domestic animals here. They have departed to heaven and left us quite helpless in this world.”

⁴⁰ Hearing these words, Leela gently touched the head of her son with her hand, as the lotus bed leans to touch its offshoot by the stalk. ⁴¹ At her touch the boy was relieved of all his sorrow and misfortune, just like the summer heat of the mountain is reduced by the showers of rainy season. ⁴² All others in the house were as highly gratified at the sight of the goddesses as when a pauper is relieved of his poverty, or the sick are healed by a draught of nectar.

⁴³ Rama said, “Remove my doubt, sage. Why didn’t Leela appear in her own form of Arundhati before her eldest son, Jyeshtha Sarma?”

⁴⁴ Vasishta answered:—

You forget, O Rama, and think that Leela had a material body or could assume one at pleasure. She was in an astral form, her form of pure intellect, and it was with her spiritual hand that she touched the inner spirit of the boy and not his material body.

⁵² In this manner, everyone is of the form of whatever he thinks himself to be. It is only habit that makes him to believe himself as such. He is not so in reality. ⁵³ But Leela, who had known the truth of the nonexistence of the world, was conscious of its nothingness and viewed all things as false conceptions of the mind. ⁵⁴ Thus he who sees only Brahma filling the sphere of his consciousness has no room for a son or friend or wife. ⁵⁵ He who views the whole as filled with the spirit of Brahma, with nothing produced in it, has no room for affection or hatred for anybody in it.

⁵⁶ The hand that Leela laid on the head of Jyeshtha Sarma, her eldest son, was not laid from her maternal affection for him, but for his edification in intellectual knowledge. ⁵⁷ Consciousness being awakened, there is all joy attendant upon it. It is more subtle than ether and far purer than vacuum, and leads the intellectual being above the region of air. All other things are like images in a dream.

Chapter 27 — Leela Remembers Her Past Lives

¹ Then the two ladies disappeared from that place, leaving the brahmin family in their house in the mountainous village. ² The family exclaimed “We are highly favored by the woodland goddesses.” Then forgetting their grief, they returned to their domestic employments.

⁸ Saraswati replied, “Because then you were not perfect by your practice of meditation to have your wish fulfilled, nor had you lost your sense of duality which prevents perfection. ⁹ He who has not known unity is not entitled to the acts and benefits of faith in the true God, as no one sitting in the sun can enjoy the coolness of shade.”

¹⁰ “You were not practiced to forget your identity as Leela. Nor had you learned that it is not your will, but the will of God that is always fulfilled. ¹¹ Later you become pure desire and wished that your son might see you, whereby he was able to see you. ¹² If you should return now to your husband and do the same, you will undoubtedly be successful in your desire.”

¹³ Leela said, “I see within the sphere of this dome (of my mind) that the holy brahmin has been my husband before. I also see that after he died, he became a ruler of the earth. ¹⁴ In my mind I see that spot of the earth, that city and his palace where I sat as his queen. ¹⁵ Within myself I see my lord reigning in that place, and I can even see how he died afterwards. ¹⁶ I see the glory of the ruler of so many countries on earth, and I also see the perfect frankness of his conduct throughout his life.”

¹⁹ The goddess replied, “Tell me Leela, to which husband should you go? You have had and will have hundreds of them in your past and future lives, and now there are three of them confined in this earth.

²⁰ The nearest of the three is the brahmin here who is reduced to ashes. The next is the king lying in state and covered with flowers in the inner apartment.”

worldliness. His intelligence is perverted to stupidity. He is converted to a tortoise in the ocean of the world.²³ The management of his very many disordered state affairs has stultified him into a clumsy lout, and he is now fast asleep amidst the turmoil of business.²⁴ The strong chain of his thoughts has bound him to think that he is a lord, mighty and accomplished, and that he is happy and can enjoy his estates forever.”

³⁴ Leela said, “So it is, O mother of mankind. I come to remember now that my present birth is of a royal kind, neither too pure nor gross in nature.³⁵ I, having descended from Brahma, have undergone a hundred and eight births and, after passing various states, I find myself still in existence.”

“Then, after the woods were burnt down by a wildfire, I was regenerated into the form of an hermit’s child.⁴¹ Here I was taught the formulas for removing the curse of womanhood, and I became a male in the person of the handsome prince of the land of Surashtra (Surat) where I reigned for a hundred years.⁴² “Then, on account of my misconduct in the government, I was denounced to become a weasel covered with leprosy, living in the lowlands of Tali.”

⁴³ “I remember, O goddess, how I became a bullock in Surat and how for full eight years I was goaded by thoughtless cowherd children in their merry sport.⁴⁴ I have in mind that when I was transformed into a bird, with what difficulty I broke the net that was laid by bird-catchers for my destruction. It was in the same manner as we release ourselves from the snares of sinful desires.⁴⁵ I remember with pleasure when as a bee I landed lightly on the leaflets of blossoms, sipped the honey of the blooming buds, dined on the pistils, and slept in the cups of lotus flowers.⁴⁶ In the form of an antelope I wandered about in pleasant woodlands and lawns with my exalted and branching horns and beautiful eyes, until I was killed by a hunter's arrow.⁴⁷ I have been in the form of a fish, and I was lifted up by the waves of the sea above the surface of the water. I saw how a tortoise was killed by the blow of a club on the neck."

⁵¹ "Next I was a fairy apsara with a form as bright as melted gold and features as beautiful as those of the lotus and lily in which the celestials used to take delight like bees and butterflies.⁵² I remember being on earth, having decked myself in gold, pearls, rubies and other gems, and playing with my youthful consorts in pleasure gardens and groves, and on hills and mountains."

⁵⁷ "I remember also how I slighted the loves of amorous youths and spurned the lesser demigod (vidyadhara) children on the Gandha Madana and Mandara hills.⁵⁸ I remember likewise the pangs of a lovelorn lass as I lay pining in my bed strewn with the fragrance of camphor, and how I was decaying like the disc of the waning moon."

Chapter 28 — Leela's Vision in Meditation; Description of the Mountain Hamlet

¹ Rama said, "Tell me sage, how did the goddesses break out of the strongholds of their bodies and the prison-house of this world and pass through infinite space and survey the scenes beyond its confines?"

² Vasishta replied:—

Where is the world and where is its support or solidity? They were all situated in the region within the minds of the goddesses. ³ In their minds they saw the hilly tract where the brahmin Vasishta lived and had his desire for royalty. ⁴ They saw his deserted house and in their minds they saw the surface of the earth stretching to the seas.

⁵ In that imaginary spot of earth they saw the city of the king and the royal palace which he had enjoyed with Arundhati, his wife. ⁶ They saw how she was born under the name of Leela and how she worshipped the goddess of wisdom, Saraswati, by whom she was miraculously conveyed to the delightful region of the sky. ⁷ It was in the house situated in that hilly village that she saw the world placed within the space of her mind.

¹⁶ Discoursing in this manner between themselves, the two charming ladies, walked out of the house with their graceful steps.

²¹ Clouds from the vault of heaven hung over the tops of trees covered with flowers and shed their pearly drops of rainwater profusely upon them, forming streams below. ²² The banks of the streamlets were continually lapped by waves raised by winds playing upon the shaking trees. Branches spread a cooling shade all around.

³² There were rows of crows sitting on the tops of tall palm trees from whose sight children were hiding the remains of their sweetmeat.

³⁶ They saw naked beggar children crowding in a compound, curd smeared on their faces and hands, cow dung on their bodies, and holding flowery branches of plants in their hands.

green grazing ground. Confident deer and does were lying tamely in the yard, and peacocks danced merrily before waterfalls as if they were showers of rainwater.⁶² Fragrant breezes were blowing giddily with the flavors of the fragrances they bore. Medicinal plants were lending their lights like lamps at night. Bird nests resounded with ceaseless warbling, and the noise of waterfalls deafened the ears of men on the bank.

Chapter 29 — Description of Leela's Life as Arundhati; Description of Astral Travel in Space

Vasishta speaking:—

⁴ Leela said, “By your favor, O goddess, and by sight of this place, I recollect all that I did and thought of in my past life. ⁵ Here I grew up to old age, and here I withered and become lean and thin as a skeleton.”

“I was a brahmani here and had my body scratched by dried sacrificial grass (kusa). ⁶ I was the legal wife of my lord and producer of his race. I was employed milking cattle and churning curd. I had been mother of many sons and a kind hostess to my guests. ⁷ I was devoted to the service of the gods, brahmins and good people, and rubbed my body with cow milk and ghee.”

“I cleaned the frying pans and boiling kettles of the house. ⁸ I boiled food daily with a single bracelet of glass and one of conch-shell on my wrists. I served my father, mother, brother, daughters and sons-in-law with their daily meals. ⁹ Working all day and night, my body was emaciated like that of a domestic servant. ‘Haste and hasten’ were the words I used to repeat to myself.”

¹⁰ “Being so busy, I was silly and ignorant. Although I was the wife of a brahmin, I never wondered, not even in a dream, about what I was and what was this world. ¹¹ Fully engaged in the collection of fuel, cow-dung, and sacrificial wood and vegetables, I became emaciated in my body, which was wrapped in a worn out blanket.”

¹⁵ “With my infirm body and ears shaking like dried tree leaves, and supporting myself on a stick, I lived here under the dread of old age.”

²⁰ “This, O goddess, is the place where I used to eat and sit, and where I slept and walked. These are the places where I gave and received the things from my attendants. ²¹ This is my eldest son, Jyeshtha Sarma, weeping in the house. That is my milk cow, now grazing on the grassy plain in the forest.”

²² “I see this portico and these windows, once as dear to me as my own self, smeared with the dry powder of the spring Holi festival. ²³ I see these pulpy gourds, planted with my own hands and dear to me as myself, now spreading themselves over the oven area. ²⁴ I see my relatives wearing rudraksha beads, who before had been the bonds of my life, carrying fuel for fire, eyes tearing from the smoke. ²⁵ I see that stony shore pelting its pebbles against force of the waves that baffle the beach, now covered by bushes. ²⁶ The green meadows were full of leafy plants, dew drops on their tips. The plains were whitened from hailstones falling on them in showers. ²⁷ The midday was covered by sunbeams, like a white mist of frost. The tree groves resounded with humming of bees fluttering about clustering flowers.”

³¹ “There I see the altar of my house, so beautifully decorated with flowering vines, clusters of fruits and flowers hanging over its windows. ³² Here lived my husband, whose life in its aerial form has fled to the sky and became lord of the earth reaching the surrounding seas. ³³ I remember how he had fostered the fond wish of obtaining royal dignity, and how ardently he looked forward to its attainment. ³⁴ I see, O goddess, his royal dignity of eight days, which had seemed to be so long in duration.”

³⁹ Vasishta said:—

Having said so, Leela bowed down to Saraswati and entered the shrine. Then, like a bird, she flew into the air with the goddess. ⁴⁰ It was a region devoid of darkness and as fair as a sea of moonlight. Then it became as blue as the body of Narayana and as bright as the back of a locust. ⁴¹ They passed above the regions of the clouds and winds, then beyond the spheres of the orbits of the sun and moon. ⁴² They passed beyond the path of the north star and the limits of the circuits of the sadhya deities, spiritual masters, and other celestial beings. ⁴³ From there they ascended to the higher heavens of Brahma and the Tushita divinities, then upward to the sphere of Golaka (the zodiac), and from there to the world of Shiva and to the sphere of the departed souls of the dead.

⁴⁴ Passing beyond the spheres of embodied living beings and of the bodiless souls of the dead, they proceeded far and farther to the unknown regions of empty space. ⁴⁵ Having passed the ethereal sphere, they saw nothing there except the sun, moon and the stars shining below them. ⁴⁶ There was only a deep darkness to be seen, filling the whole void of space and appearing like the basin of the waters of universal deluge, and as compact as the impenetrable cavity of a rock.

⁴⁷ Leela said, “Tell me, O goddess! What happened to the light of the sun and other stars? Where did this darkness, dense like a fist, come from?”

⁵² Saraswati said, “Behind this is the great pole of the universe that is scattered with innumerable nebular stars like particles of dust.”

⁵³ Vasishtha said:—

As they were talking in this manner, they glided imperceptibly to that pole, like a bee saunters over a solitary hut on the height of a mountain. ⁵⁴ They were at no pains to come down from that precipice, as there is no pain to effect what must certainly come to pass, even though it appears difficult at first.

⁵⁸ There is no beginning, middle or end to that infinite space. It produces nothing, like a barren woman of her offspring. ⁵⁹ It is only an extended expanse, infinite, calm and without beginning, middle or end, situated in the Supreme Spirit. ⁶⁰ Its immensity is as immeasurable as a stone flung with full force from its top. It is impossible for a garuda bird, flying with all his might at full speed over the course of an entire kalpa age, to reach from one end to the other .

Chapter 30 — Vasishta Describes the Universe, the Cosmic Egg (Brahmanda)

Vasishta speaking:—

¹ Within a moment they passed beyond the regions of the earth, air, fire, water and space and the tracks of the ten planetary spheres. ² They reached boundless space from where the universe appears like an egg. ³ Under its vault they saw millions of luminous particles floating in the air, ⁴ like innumerable bubbles floating on the waters of the unlimited ocean of the sphere of Consciousness. ⁵ Some particles were going downward, and others rising upward; some turning round, and others appeared to their understanding to remain fixed and immovable. ⁶ These different motions were only apparent as they saw them from different sides. ⁷ Here there were no ups or downs, no upside or below, and no going forward or backward. Here there are no directions as men know. ⁸ There is only one indefinite space in nature, as there is only one consciousness in all beings. Yet everything moves in its own way, just like wayward children take their own course.

⁹ Rama said, “Tell me sage, why do we refer to up and down, forward and backward, if there is no such thing in space and nature?”

¹⁰ Vasishta said:—

There is only one space enveloping all things. The worlds seen in the infinite and indiscernible womb of emptiness are like worms moving on the surface of water. ¹¹ All these bodies that move about in the world by their lack of freedom are thought to be up and down relative to our position on earth. ¹² So when there are ants on an earthen ball, all its sides are reckoned below that are under their feet, and those as above which are over their backs. ¹³ Such is this ball of earth in one of these worlds, covered by vegetables and animals moving on it, and by gods, demons and men walking upon it. ¹⁴ It is also covered by cities, towns and mountains and their inhabitants and productions, like a walnut by its shell.

nothing is stable in nature. Everything is as changing as people alter and add to the acts and customs enjoined in the Vedas and scriptures.

²⁵ There are other Brahmas and other patriarchs, and many Vishnus and many Indras, one after the other. We have different kings of men, and sometimes no ruler of them.

³⁰ The world is filled with creatures beyond the conception of even yogis. Even we cannot form even a guess of all the beings that fill infinite space. ³¹ This world is the sphere for these living beings, but the great emptiness that spreads beyond is so extensive that the gods Vishnu and others are unable to measure it even if they were to traverse it for the whole of their lives. ³² Every one of these ethereal globes is encircled by a belt resembling a golden bracelet, and each has an attractive power like the earth to attract other objects.

³³ I have told you all about the grandeur of the universe to my best knowledge. I have no knowledge or power to describe anything beyond this. ³⁴ There are many other large worlds, unseen by others, rolling through the immense space of vacuum, like giddy yaksha demons revel in the dark and dismal deserts and forests.

Chapter 31 — Leela & Saraswati Arrive on Earth; Fate of Good & Bad Fallen in War

After having seen the worlds in their aerial journey, the ladies arrived on earth and quickly entered King Padma's inner apartment. ² There they saw the king's dead body lying in state under heaps of flowers, Leela's spiritual body sitting beside the corpse. ³ It was the dead of night and the residents had fallen into sound sleep one by one. The room was perfumed with the incense of resin, camphor, sandalwood and saffron.

⁴ Leela, seeing the house of her late husband and wishing to enter it, came to his tomb in her assumed body. ⁵ Then she passed through the fictitious spacious palace of her lord by breaking out of the confines of her body and head that in yoga terminology are called earthly and worldly environs. ⁶ Then with the goddess she went again to the bright and spacious temple of the world and quickly entered. ⁷ She saw her husband's imaginary world (that of King Viduratha) like a dirty and mossy pool, just like a lioness beholds a mountain cave covered by darkness and clouds. ⁸ Then the two goddesses entered that empty world with their airy bodies, like weak ants make their passage through the hard crust of the wood-apple. ⁹ There they passed through regions of cloudy hills and skies, and reached the surface of the earth, consisting of tracts of land and basins of water. ¹⁰ They came to the continent of Jambu (Asia) situated amid the nine-fold petals of the other continents, and from there proceeded to the territories of Leela's husband in the land of Bharata (India).

¹⁴ There were the spiritual masters (siddhas), charana and sura demigods, celestial gandharvas, supernatural vidyadharas, and other celestials and apsara nature spirits in large bodies. ¹⁵ There were also bhuta and pisacha demons, and rakshasa demon cannibals; while female vidyadhara were flinging handfuls of flowers on the combatants like showers of rain. ¹⁶ The evil-spirit vetalas, yakshas and kushmands were looking at the battle with pleasure, taking the shelter of hills to avoid flying arrows and weapons. ¹⁷ The imps were flying from the air to keep out of the path of flying weapons. The spectators were excited by sound of the combatants' war cries.

²³ Rama asked, "Tell me, sage, what sort of a warrior is called a hero and becomes a jewel in heaven, and who is an insurgent?”

²⁴ Vasishtha answered:—

He who engages in a lawful warfare and fights for his king, whether he dies or becomes victorious in the field, is called a hero and goes to heaven. ²⁵ Whoever otherwise kills men in war for an unjust cause and dies is called an insurgent and goes to hell. ²⁶ Whoever fights for unlawful property and dies in battle becomes subject to everlasting hellfire. ²⁷ Whoever wages a war justified by law and custom, that warrior is called both loyal and heroic in deed. ²⁸ Whoever dies in war with a willing mind to protect cattle, brahmins and friends, and whoever protects his guest and refugee with all diligence, after his death he truly becomes an ornament in heaven.

³⁵ It was in expectation of seeing such heroes that the maidens of the gods were standing in the air and talking among themselves about becoming the wives of such warriors. ³⁶ The air was decorated by an illumination on high, and by rows of beautiful heavenly cars of gods and masters, and by the presence of celestial maidens who sang in sweet notes and decorated their hair with mandara flowers.

Chapter 32 — Onset of the War

Leela, standing in air with the goddess of wisdom, saw the apsara nymphs dancing with eagerness for the war between combatants below. ² She saw the armies assemble in her own territory once governed by her lord. She saw the field of the air no less formidable because of the assembled ghosts.

cloud. Darts hissing in the air resembled the rustling of breeze amidst the dry leaves of trees.

²⁵ Now began the main battle, like the dashing of clouds upon clouds at the end of a kalpa age. War raged like sea whipped by a hurricane. ²⁶ Big elephants fell in the field like coal-black rocks hurled down by gusts of wind. ²⁷ It seemed like infernal spirits had been let loose from their caves of hell to rage in the battlefield with their horrid and dismal figures. ²⁸ The dark cloud of swords hid daylight and warriors raised their black spears, seemingly bent upon converting the earth into an ocean of bloodshed.

Chapter 33 — The Battle: the Armies Engage

[The whole of this chapter abounds in onomatopoeian alliterations, and is more a play upon words than display of sense. However, it is interesting for these jingling words and for the names of the weapons in use among the ancients. — V. L. Mitra]

¹ Rama said, “Sage, describe this warfare to me, as I love stories of this kind.”

² Vasishta said:—

The ladies, in order to have a better view of the battle below, ascended in their imaginary aerial cars to a more retired spot in the higher regions of the sky.

Chapter 34 — The Battle as Seen by Onlookers

Vasishtha speaking:—

¹ The generals and ministers of the warring sides, and the aerial spectators of the battles, were talking among themselves this way.

⁴ What are these, says one, that are flying like straws in the sky? They are, says the other, no straws but the flight of arrows that have filled the air. ⁵ Another cries that as long as the dust of the earth is wet with the blood of the brave, heroes are entitled to glory and have their home in heaven for myriads of years. ⁶ A scripture says to fear not these dark swords whose blades are worn by the brave like petals of blue lotuses about their breasts, and the brave are favorites in the eyes of the goddess of fortune.

¹⁷ The showers of arrows falling on the elephants resemble the showers of raindrops on mountain tops. The darts sticking to their front bones are like bolts of lightning piercing the cliff tops. ¹⁸ While a headless body was groveling on the ground for lack of its head, its head was flying on high like a bird of air, proclaiming its immortality in heaven. ¹⁹ The army harassed by stones slung at their heads cried to entrap the enemy in the snares set at their feet.

Chapter 35 — The Battle: Description of the Battlefield

[First the battle ground is compared with the sky, then with the sea, next with a forest, and last with the final doomsday. — V.L. Mitra.]

Then waves of cavalry mounting to the sky made the battlefield appear like a raging sea. ² Moving umbrellas floated as its foam and froth, and feathered silvery arrows glided like finny pearly fish, while cavalry charges and flights heaved and dashed like surges of the sea. ³ Rushing of weapons resembled the running of its currents, and circles of soldiers were its whirlpools. The elephants were like its islets and their motions resembled the rocks moving in it. ⁴ Whirling discs were its eddies, and long hair flying on heads its floating weeds. Sparkling sands were its shining waters, and the flash of swords its glassy spray. ⁵ Gigantic warriors were its whales and alligators, and the resounding caves like its gurgling whirlpools. ⁶ Flying arrows were its swimming fishes, and floating flags resembled its uprising waves and bores. ⁷ Shining weapons formed the waters of this ocean and their whirlpools also, while the long lines of forces appeared like the huge and horrible bodies of its whales. ⁸ Soldiers clad in black iron armor were like the dark blue waters of the deep, and headless bodies groveling in dust were like the whirling currents of the sea, with scattered weapons like sea weeds.

²³ The dire massacre made a sea of blood with hurling stones as its shoals and rocks. Flying arms resembled stars falling from heaven. ²⁴ The sky was like a sea full of whirlpools of discs hurled through the air. There were burning fires performing funerals of the slain. ²⁵ Missiles were like bolts of thunder that struck rock-like elephants dead in the field to block the passage of men. ²⁶ Earth and sky were hidden by a thick cloud of showering arrows, and the army below was a sea of tempestuous warfare and bloodshed. ²⁷ Destructive weapons were flying on all sides, like huge dragons of the sea carried aloft by gusts of wind from the stormy main. ²⁸ The flying arms of bolts, swords, discs, pikes and lances were blazing and breaking one another in the air with such hideous noise that it seemed to be a second deluge, when the last tornado blew up everything on high, scattering them in all directions, crushing and smashing them with a tremendous peal.

¹ Heaps of arrows rising in spires above the ground drove the cowards and the wounded far away from the battlefield. ² Hills of dead bodies of men, horses and elephants, heaving in promiscuous heaps and appearing like clouds fallen upon earth, invited the demon yakshas, rakshasas and carnivorous pisachas to come and play in the wide ocean of blood.

²¹ Now hear me relate to you, the forces on the side of Padma, now named King Viduratha, and the allied powers that came to his side from the Central and Eastern districts.²² There came the hardy warriors of Kosala and Benares; those of Magadha and Utkala, situated in the east; and the Mekhalas (of Vindhya range), the Karkars (of Karnatic), and the Madras in the south.²³ The chiefs of Hema and Rudras and the Tamils from the south; the Pragjyotishas, and the horse faced Osmuks and Ambashtha cannibals.²⁴ Then there joined the Varna-koshthas and Viswotras, and the eaters of raw food and flesh and the fish eaters; and those with faces like tigers, the Kiratas, with the Sauviras and one legged people.²⁵ Next came the mountaineers of Malyavana, Sibira and Anjanagiri; and others having the ensigns of bulls and lotuses, and the people of the sun rising mountain in the east.²⁶ Those that joined from the south east, are the following, namely: the Vindhyaaris, the Chedis, the Vatsas, the Dasarnas (near the confluence of the ten streams); and the Angas, Bangas and Upabangas (of Upper and Lower Bengal).²⁷ They that met from the south were, Kalingas and Pundras, the Jatharas, Vidarbhas and the hill people; the Sabaras, the outcaste tribals, the Karnas and the Tripura people.²⁸ Those named Kankakas from their thorny district, the unenlightened Komalas; the Canarese, the Andhras, the Cholas and the people on the borders of the Charmanvati river.²⁹ The Kakos or bald-headed and bearded people, and those of the Hemakuta Hills; the frizzled and long necked people, and the inhabitants of Kishkindha and cocoa forests.³⁰ The princes that joined with Leela's husband from the south, were as follows: the Vindhyaans, the Kusumians (of Patna), the Mahendras and the Darduras.³¹ The Malays and the solar race, and the Prince of the thirty-three united states and the rich and united cities of Avanti and Sambavati.³² And those of Dasapura of Katha, Chakra, Reshika Cutch and others, and the foresters of Upagiri and Bhadrageiri Hills.³³ The prince of Nagore and the chiefs of Dandaka Forest, and the joint states of the people; the Sahas, Saivas, and the hill people of the Rishyamuka and Karkota and the Vimbila foresters.³⁴ Then came the inhabitants from the banks of Pampa, the Kerakas and Karkaviras; with the Kherikas, Asikas and the people of Dhrumapattana.³⁵ Next came the Kasikas and Khallukas, the Yadas and Tamraparnikas; the Gonardas, the Kanakas and the people of Dinapattam.³⁶ The Tamils, Kadambharas, Sahakaras and Deer Hunters, the Vaitundas, Tumbavanalas, and those attired in deer and elephant skins.³⁷ Then came the lotus-like Sibis and Konkans and the inhabitants of Chitrakuta mountains; with the people of Karnata, the Mantas, Batakas and those of Cattak.³⁸ The Andhras and Kola hill people, the Avantis and Chedis; with the Chandas and Devanakas and Krauncha-vahas.³⁹ At last came the people from the three peaks of Chitrakuta mountains, called the Silakhara, Nanda mardana and Malaya, which were the seats of the guardian Bakshasas of Lanka.⁴⁰ Then those of the southwest where there is the great realm of Surat, with the kingdoms of the Sind, Sauvira, Abhira, and Dravidas (in Deccan).⁴¹ Also those of the districts of Kikata, Siddha Khanda, and Kaliruha, and Mount Hemagiri or golden hills and the Raivataka range.⁴² Then the warriors of Jaya Kachchha, and Mewar; as also the Yavanas, the Bahlikas, the Marganas (nomads), and the grey colored Tumbas (on the north).⁴³ Then there came Lahsa races and many hill peoples, inhabiting the borders of the sea, forming the limit of the dominion of Leela's husband on the north.

countries. ⁴⁷ Thence stretch the countries of the Saivyas, Amarakas, the Paschatyas and Guhutwas; and then the Haihaya country, and those of the Suhyas, Gayas and Tajikas and Hunas. ⁴⁸ Then along the side of some other countries, there is the range of Karka Hills, inhabited by barbarous people, devoid of caste, customs and limits of moral duties. ⁴⁹ Thence stretches a country hundreds of leagues in length, to the boundary mountain of Mahendra, abounding in rich stones and gems. ⁵⁰ After that stands the Aswa Range with hundreds of hills about it; and extending to the dread ocean on the north of the Pariyatra Range. ⁵¹ On the north western side, there are countries beyond the boundary mountains (of Asia), where Venupati was the king of the land. ⁵² Then there are the countries of the Phalgunakas and Mandavayas and many other peoples; and those of Purukundas and Paras as bright as the orb of the sun. ⁵³ Then the races of Vanmilas and Nalinas and the Dirghas; who are so called, from their tall statures and long arms and hairs. Then there are the Rangas, Stanikas with protuberant breasts, and the Guruhas and Chalugas. ⁵⁴ After that is the kingdom of women, where they feed upon bullocks and heifers. Now about the Himalayas and its hills in the north (of India): ⁵⁵ these are the Krauncha and Madhuman hills; and the Kailasa, Vasuman and the Sumeru peaks; at the foot of which are the people, known under many names. ⁵⁶ Beside these there met the warlike tribes of India consisting of the Madrawars, Malavas and Sura-senas. The Rajputs of the race of Arjuna, the Trigartas and the one legged people and Khudras. ⁵⁷ There were the Abalas, Prakhalas, and Sakas. The Khemadhurtas, the Dasadhanas, the Gavasanas and Club Fighters. ⁵⁸ The Dhanadas and Sarakas and Batadhanas also, with the islanders and Gandharas and Avanti warriors of Malwa. ⁵⁹ The warlike Taxilas, the Bilavas, Godhanas and the renowned warriors of Pushkara. ⁶⁰ Then there were the Tikshas and Kalavaras, and the inhabitants of the cities of Kahaka and Surabhuti likewise. ⁶¹ There were the people of the Ratikadarsa and Antaradarsa also; and the Pingalas, the Pandyas, Yamanas and Yatudhanas demons too. ⁶² There were also the races of men, known as Hematalas and Osmuks, together with the hilly tribes, inhabiting the Himalaya, Vasuman, Krauncha and Kailasa Mountains. ⁶³ Hear me now relate to you the peoples that came from the north east quarter, which extends a hundred and eighty leagues in its circumference. ⁶⁴ There came also the Kalutas and Brahmaputras, the Kunidas and Khudinas, with the warlike Malavas and the champions of the Randhra and forest states. ⁶⁵ Then there were the Kedavas and Sinhaputras of dwarfish statures; the Sabas, the Kaccæs, the Pahlavis, the Kamiras and the Daradas. ⁶⁶ There were also the people of Abhisa, the Jarvakas, the Pulolas and Kuves; the Kiratas and Yamupatas, together with the poor and rich people of desert lands and tracts of gold.

⁶⁷ Thus Leela in one vision saw the homes of the gods and the forest lands and the earth in all their beauty. She saw all the seats of opulence and the buildings with which they were adorned. She saw the summit of Kailash and the delightful groves at its foot, and the level lands traversed by the aerial cars of vidyadhara and other celestial beings.

[It is not easy to say whether this lengthy description of the battle is Vasishta's or Valmiki's own making. Both of them were well acquainted with military tactics. Vasishta was the general of King Sudasa against the Persians. Valmiki was the epic poet of Rama's wars with Ravana in the celebrated Ramayana. These descriptions are left out in the translations of this work as entirely useless in yoga philosophy without regard that they formed the preliminary step to Rama's military education, which he was soon after called to complete under the guidance of Vishwamitra in his hermitage. — V. L. Mitra]

Thus the ravaging war was making a rapid end of men, horse, elephants and all. The brave coming foremost in the combat fell in equal numbers on both sides. ² These and many others were reduced to dust and ashes. The bravery of the brave served only to send them like poor moths to the fire and flame of destruction.

mountains. ⁴⁵ Flights of arrows and weapons, carried away by strong winds, moved in the air like cloud fragments with a swarm of black bees hovering under them. ⁴⁶ Flying arrows wandering with the roar of elephants appeared to be showering clouds, their feathers appeared as the woolly breed, their reedy shafts seemed like trees. ⁴⁷ Wild elephants and people of the plains were all torn to pieces like bits of torn linen. ⁴⁸ War chariots with broken wheels fell into pits like the broken crags of mountains. The enemy stood upon their tops like a thick mist or cloud. ⁴⁹ The hosts of stalwart warriors meeting on the battlefield gave it the appearance of a forest of palm and tamara trees, but when weapons chopped off their arms, they made it appear like a mountainous wood with clumps of stunted pine trees.

Chapter 38 — The Battle: End of the Day, the Battlefield after Cessation of Fighting

Now as the war waged fiercely, with mingled shouts on both sides, the sun shrouded his polished armor under the mist of darkness and was about to set.

¹⁶ The armies being at rest, there was an end of all agitation in the field, like ocean waves are lulled to rest with the calm after being churned by Mandara Mountain. ¹⁷ In an instant the battlefield became as dreadful as the dismal womb of death, and as deep and dark as the hollow pit of the sea after Agastya sucked up its waters. ¹⁸ It was covered with the dead bodies of men and beasts and flowed with the floods of purpling blood. It resounded with the sounds of insects, like a heath with the humming of beetles. ¹⁹ Gory bodies gushed with blood and gurgled like sea waves.

The cries of the wounded wanting to live pierced the ears and throbbed the heart strings of the living.

²⁰ The dead and wounded rolling around side by side in streams of blood made the living think the dead were still alive like themselves. ²¹ Big elephants lying dead in piles on the field appeared like cloud fragments, and the heaps of broken chariots looked like a forest blown over by a storm. ²² Streams of blood flowed with the dead bodies of horses and elephants, and heaps of arrows, spears, mattocks and mallets flowed together with broken swords and missiles. ²³ Horses were lying in their halters and harnesses. Dead soldiers were wrapped in their mail and armor. Flags, fans, turbans and helmets lay scattered in the field.

whirlpools. The flags were its foam and froth, and the white fans its bubbles.⁴⁴ The field of blood with scattered chariots plunged in mud and mire and covered with broken pieces of woods looked like a tract of land devastated by a hurricane.⁴⁵ It was as desolate as a country burned by a fire, or like the dry bed of the sea sucked up by the sage Agastya. It was like a district devastated by a sweeping flood.

⁵⁵ Then there were groups of sutala, vetala and uttala demons and ghosts dancing about the field with their war dances, whirling the broken bits of war-chariots upon the flying soldiers on all sides.⁵⁶ The stir and last gasp of the dying were fearful to behold, and the faces of the dying and the dead covered in dust and blood were pitiful to the beholder.⁵⁷ Devouring dogs and ravenous ravens had pity as they saw the last gasp of the dying. Carrion feeders were howling and fighting over carcasses until many of them became dead bodies from fighting each other.

⁵⁸ Now I have described the sea of blood that flowed fast with the gore of unnumbered hosts of horses, elephants and camels, and of warriors and their leaders, and the multitudes of cars and war chariots. But it became a pleasure garden to the god of death, delighting in his bed of bloodshed and grove of weapons strewn all around.

Chapter 39 — The Battlefield Infested by Nocturnal Fiends

¹² Funeral pyres blazed as brightly as the starry frame on high, and the fires consumed dead bodies with their bones and clothing. ¹³ The fire burnt bodies and bones to ashes, after which it extinguished itself as if sated with plenty. The female fiends now began to sport in the water. ¹⁴ There arose a mingled cry of dogs, crows, and yaksha demons and vetalas clapping their hands. Bodies of ghosts, thick as woods and forests, were moving about. ¹⁵ Dakinis were eager to steal away the flesh and fat from the piles of bodies gathered for funeral, and pisachas delighted in sucking the blood, flesh and bones of the dead. ¹⁶ The demons were now looking and now lurking about the funeral piles, and the rakshasa demons that rushed in carried away carcasses on their shoulders.

and flouted about with their open mouths, emitting the blaze of falling meteors.²³ Vetala ghosts fell down in the dark and discolored blood-pits, lying hidden in the midst of heaps of dead bodies, while pisacha ogres and the leaders of yogini sprites laughed at them for their false step.

Chapter 40 — Subtle Body & Astral Travel; Intellectual Body; Details on the Process of Death, Conception & Birth

The nocturnal fiends infested the gloomy field, and the attendants of Yama, the Lord of Death, roamed about it like marauders in the daytime. ² Under the canopy of thick darkness, naked and fleeting ghosts in their nightly abode reveled on their provisions of carrion that was likely to be taken by the clutches of one's hand.

³ It was in the still hour of this gloomy night, when the host of heaven seemed to be fast asleep, that a sadness stole in upon the mind of Leela's magnanimous husband, the warring King Viduratha. ⁴ He thought about what was to be done the next morning in council with his counselors, and then he went to his bed which was as white as moonlight and as cold as frost. ⁵ For a while his lotus-eyes were closed in sleep in his royal camp, which was as white as moonbeams and covered by the cold dews of night.

⁷ Rama asked, "How is it possible sage, that the gross bodies of the goddesses, with their limited dimensions, could enter the tent through one of its holes, as small as the pore of a piece of cloth?"

⁸ Vasishta answered saying that:—

It is impossible for someone who mistakes himself to be a material body to enter a small hole with that gross body. ⁹ But it is possible to go anywhere one pleases if he understands that he is only pent up in his physical body like in a cage and obstructed by it in his flight, and if he does not believe that he is confined by his material body but has the true notion of his inner subtle spirit. ¹⁰ He who perceives his original spiritual state to be the better half of his body may pass as a spirit through a chink. But whoever relies on the lesser half of the material body cannot go beyond it in the form of his intellect.

¹¹ As air rises upward and the flame of fire never goes downward, so the nature of spirit is to rise upward, and that of the body to go down, but the intellect is made to turn in the way in which it is trained. ¹² A man sitting in the shade has no notion of feeling heat or warmth, so one man has no idea of another man's knowledge or thoughts. ¹³ As is one's knowledge, so is his thought. Such is the mode of his life. It is only by means of ardent practice (of meditation and learning) that the mind is turned to the right course.

¹⁶ Now then, the soul resembles something seen in a dream or formed in fancy. The soul is of the nature of air and emptiness and is never obstructed anywhere in its course. ¹⁷ There is an intellectual and astral body which all living beings possess in every place. It is known as consciousness as well as the feelings of our hearts. ¹⁸ It is by Divine Will that consciousness rises and sets by turns. At first it was produced in its natural, simple and intellectual form and then, being invested with a material body, they together make the unity of the person out of the duality of material and immaterial essences.

¹⁹ Now you must know that the triple emptiness composed of the three airy substances — spirit, mind and space — are one and the same thing, but not so their receptacle the material body which has no ability to flow or extend.

²⁴ Yet it becomes as big as a mountain lifting its head to heaven, and as large as the earth which is the fixed and firm support of all things. It views the inside and outside of everything, and bears the forests like hairs on its body. ²⁵ It extends in the form of the sky and contains millions of worlds in itself. It identifies itself with the ocean, and transforms its whirlpools to spots upon its person.

²⁶ This intellectual, consciousness body of beings is of the nature of an uninterrupted understanding, ever calm and serene in its aspect. It is possessed of its intellectual form from before the creation of the visible world, and being all comprehensive as emptiness itself, it understands the natures of all beings. ²⁷ It is as unreal as water in a mirage, but by its intelligence, it manifests itself as a reality to the understanding. Without this exercise of the intellect, the intellectual man is as nothing as the son of a barren woman, and as blank as the figure of a body seen in a dream.

²⁸ Rama asked, “What is that mind to which you attribute so many powers? What is that which you say to be nothing? Why is it no reality and something distinct from all that we see?”

All individual minds are provided with these faculties, except those whose minds are engrossed with the error of the outer world. ³⁰ All worlds are either of a longer or shorter duration, and they appear and disappear at times. Some of these vanish in a moment and others endure to the end of a kalpa age. But it is not so with the mind, whose progress I will now relate to you.

³⁴ Rama said, “As we believe ourselves to be reproduced after death by reason of our memories, so must we understand the re-creation of all bodies in the world by the same cause. Hence there is nothing uncaused in it.”

³⁵ Vasishta replied:—

The gods Hari (Vishnu), Hara (Shiva) and others, having obtained their disembodied liberation (videha-mukti) at the universal dissolution, could not retain their memory to cause their regeneration.

⁴¹ Next this minutely intelligent substance is joined with the five internal senses that form its body and which is otherwise called its spiritual or ethereal body (ativahika or lingadeha; the astral or subtle body). ⁴² This spiritual being, by its long association with the external senses, comes to believe it has ordinary senses, so it finds itself invested with a material body (adhibhautika deha) as beautiful as that of a lotus. ⁴³ Then seated in the embryo, it rests in a certain position for sometime, and then inflates itself like the air until it is fully expanded.

⁴⁴ Then it thinks itself to be fully developed in the womb, like a man dreams of a fairy form in his sleep and believes this illusion as a reality. ⁴⁵ Then he views the outer world where he is born to die, just like one visits a land where he is destined to meet his death, and there he remains to relish its enjoyments, as prepared for him.

⁴⁹ The knowledge that I am born here of this father and that this is my mother, these are my treasures and such are my hopes and expectations, is as false as empty air. ⁵⁰ That these are my merits and these my demerits, and these the desires that I had at heart, that I was a boy and am now young, are the airy thoughts of the hollow mind.

and demons its birds of the air. Broad daylight is the flying dust of its flowers and the dark night the deep hiding place of its grove. ⁵³ The seas are like its streams and fountains and the eight boundary mountains are its artificial hills. The mind is its great water reservoir containing the weeds and shrubs of human thoughts in abundance.

⁶¹ The world according to the sense in which I take it, as the seat of God, is highly interesting, but not so in your sense of it being a sober reality. So the meaning of the words "I" and "you" according to me refers to the intellectual spirit, and according to you to the individual soul and body.

⁶² Hence Leela and Saraswati, being in their empty astral bodies, were led by the pure desire of their souls to every place without any obstruction or interruption. ⁶³ The spirit of consciousness has the power to present itself wherever it likes, on earth or in the sky, and before objects known or unknown and wished to be known by it. It was by this power that they could enter into the tent of the prince.

Chapter 41 — Leela & Saraswati enter King Viduratha's Tent; He Remembers His Past Lives; Everything Is within the Temple of the Mountain Brahmin; Discrimination of Error

When the ladies entered the tent, it appeared like a bed of lotuses. Its white ceiling seemed as graceful as the vault of heaven with two moons rising at once under it. ² A pure and cooling fragrance spread about it, as if blown by the breeze from mandara flowers, and lulled the prince to sleep. Everyone was lying in their camps. ³ It made the place as pleasant as the celestial pleasure garden of Nandana and healed all the pains and cares of the people there. It seemed like a spring garden filled with the fragrance of the fresh blown lotuses in the morning.

Hearing these words of the goddess, the minister spoke saying, ¹⁴ “It is by your favor, O gracious goddesses, that I am empowered to relate of my king's ancestry to your kind graces.”

¹⁵ “There was a sovereign born of the imperial line of Ikshvaku named Mukundaratha, who had subjugated the earth under his arms. ¹⁶ He had a moon-faced son by name of Bhadraratha, whose son Viswaratha was father to the renowned prince Brihadratha. ¹⁷ His son Sindhuratha was the father of Saileratha, and his son Kamaratha was father of Maharatha. ¹⁸ His son Vishnuratha was father of Nabhoratha, who gave birth to this my lord of handsome appearance.”

blessed today by your favor.” After saying these words, the minister remained silent with the lord of the earth.

²⁹ He said, “I have come to know this by the favor of the goddesses, but how is it that so many events have occurred to me in course of one day after my death? ³⁰ Here I have passed a lifetime full of seventy years and remember having done many works and having seen my grandson. ³¹ I recollect the bygone days of my boyhood and youth, and I remember well all the friends and relatives and all the clothes and attendants that I had before.”

Know O king that after the fit of unconsciousness attending your death was over, your soul continued to remain in the emptiness of the same place where you still reside. ³³ This royal pavilion, where you think yourself living, is situated in the empty space within the house of the brahmin in that hilly district. ³⁴ It is inside that house that you see the appearances of your other homes present before you, and it was in that brahmin’s house that you devoted your life to my worship. ³⁵ It is the shrine within that same house and on the same spot that contains the whole world which you are now seeing all about you. ³⁶ This abode of yours is situated in that same place and within the clear firmament of your mind.

³⁷ It is a false notion of your mind, which you have gained by your habitual mode of thinking, that you are born in your present state of the race of Ikshvaku. ³⁸ Mere imagination has made you suppose yourself to be named so and so, and that such and such persons were your ancestors; that you had been a boy of ten years; ³⁹ that your father became an ascetic in the woods and left you governing the realm; that you have subjugated many countries under your dominion and are now reigning as the lord paramount over them; ⁴⁰ and that you are ruling on earth with these ministers and officers of yours, observing sacrificial rites and justly ruling your subjects.

⁴⁶ You remember the many acts and pleasures of your past life in the body of King Padma before you were snatched away by the hand of death. ⁴⁷ You now perceive in your mind that your present life is only a shadow of the former, as it is the same wave that by its rise and fall carries one onward. ⁴⁸ The constant current of the mind flows like a river and leads a man, like a weed, from one whirlpool to another. ⁴⁹ The course of life now runs alone as in dreaming, and then accompanied by the body as in the waking state, both of which leave their traces in the mind at the hour of death.

⁵⁴ In reality you were neither born nor dead at anytime or any place, but ever remain as pure consciousness in the tranquility of your own soul. ⁵⁵ You seem to see all things about you, but you are seeing nothing real in them. Your all-seeing soul sees everything in itself. ⁵⁶ The soul shines by its own light like a brilliant gem. Nothing that appears beside it, whether this earth or yourself or anything else, is a reality.

⁶⁰ The sphere of this vaulted shrine is as clear as emptiness itself, which has no earth or house in it. ⁶¹ It is without any forest, hill, sea or river, and yet all beings are found to rove about in this empty and homeless abode. ⁶² Here there are no kings, no royal retinue, and nothing else that kings have on earth.

Viduratha asked, "If it is so, then tell me goddess, how did I happen to have these dependants here?"

⁶³ A man is rich in his own mind and spirit. Is it not so ordained by Divine Mind and spirit? If not, then the world must appear as a mere dream, and all these men and things are only creatures of our dreams. ⁶⁴ Tell me goddess, what things are spiritually true and false? How are we to distinguish the one from the other?"

⁶⁵ Saraswati answered:—

Know prince that those who have known the only knowable One and are assimilated in the nature of pure understanding view nothing as real in the world except the empty consciousness within themselves. ⁶⁶ The misconception of the serpent in a rope being removed, the fallacy of the rope is removed also. The unreality of the world being known, the error of its existence also ceases to exist. ⁶⁷ Knowing the falsity of water in a mirage, no one thirsts after it anymore. Knowing the falsehood of dreams, no one thinks himself dead as he had dreamt. The fear of dreaming death may overtake the dying, but it can never assail the living in his dream.

⁶⁸ He whose soul is enlightened with the clear light of his pure consciousness is never misled into believing his own existence, or that of others, by the false application of the terms “I”, “you”, “this” or the like.

Valmiki speaking:—

⁶⁹ As the sage was lecturing in this manner, the day departed to its evening service with the setting sun. The assembly broke with mutual greetings to perform their evening rituals, and it met again with the rising sun, after dispersion of the gloom of night.

Chapter 42 — Philosophy of Dreaming (Swapnam); Creation Is a Dream; Viduratha Asks a Boon to Be Reunited with His (Second) Queen Leela

¹ The man who is devoid of understanding, ignorant and unacquainted with the all-pervading principle, thinks the unreal world as real, dense and concrete. ² Just like a child is not freed from his fear of ghosts until his death, so the ignorant man never gets rid of his fallacy of the reality of the unreal world as long as he lives. ³ Just like solar heat causes the error of water in the mirage to both deer and unwary people, so the unreal world appears as real to the ignorant part of mankind. ⁴ As the false dream of one's death appears to be true within the dreaming state, so the false world seems to be a field of action and gain to the deluded man. ⁵ Just like one, not knowing what is gold, sees a golden bracelet to be a mere bracelet and not gold, so the ignorant, without a knowledge of the causal substance, are ever misled by the appearances of form.

¹² The mind of the viewer remains the same in the sphere of his dreams and represents images thought of by itself in that visionary sphere of mankind. ¹³ The knowing mind has the same knowledge of things, both in its waking and dreaming states, and it is by an act of the perceiving mind that this knowledge is imprinted as true in the conscious souls of men.

¹⁵ Vasishta replied:—

The cities and houses seen in dreams are nothing in reality. The illusion (maya) of the embodied soul makes them appear as true like those seen in the waking state in this ordinary world. ¹⁶ I will give you proof of this. In the beginning of creation and by the will of the creator, the self-born Brahma himself had notions of all created things in the form of visionary appearances, like in a dream, and their subsequent development. Therefore, their creator is as unreal as the notions and appearances in the dream.

¹⁷ Learn this truth from me, that this world is a dream and that you and all other men have your sleeping dreams contained in your waking dreams of this ordinary world. ¹⁸ If the scenes in your sleeping dream have no reality in them, how can you expect those in your daydreams to be real at all?

¹⁹ As you take me for a reality, so do I also take you and all other things for realities likewise, and such is the case with everybody in this world of dreams. ²⁰ As I appear an entity to you in this ordinary world of lengthened dreams, so you too appear an actual entity to me. So it is with all in their protracted dreaming.

²¹ Rama asked, “If both these states of dreaming are alike, then tell me. When the dreamer awakens, why doesn’t he think the visions in his dream were as real as those of his daydreaming state?”

²² Vasishtha replied:—

Yes, night dreaming is of the same nature as daydreams in that dream objects appear to be real in both. Upon a man’s awakening from sleep, the night dreams vanish in empty air. Upon a man’s death, his daydreams vanish in empty air. ²³ As the objects of your night dreams do not exist in time or place upon your waking, so also those of your daydream can have no existence upon death. ²⁴ Thus everything that appears real for the present is unreal, and though it might appear as charming as a fairy form in a dream, at last it all disappears into an airy nothing.

²⁵ There is one Consciousness that fills all space. It appears as everything both within and without everybody. It is only by our illusive conception of it that we take it in different lights. ²⁶ As one picks up a jewel he happens to see in a treasure house, so according to our own liking, we lay hold on anything with which the vast Consciousness is filled.

²⁷ The goddess of intelligence, having caused the germ of true knowledge to sprout forth in the mind of the king by sprinkling the ambrosial drops of her wisdom over it, spoke to the king in this way at the end, ²⁸ “I have told you all this for the sake of Leela, and now, good king, we shall take leave of you and these illusory scenes of the world.”

²⁹ Vasishtha said:—

The intelligent king, being gently addressed by the goddess of wisdom, asked her in a humble tone.

³⁰ Viduratha said, “Your visit, O most bounteous goddess, cannot go for nothing, if when we poor mortals cannot withhold our bounty from those who petition us for help. ³¹ I will quit this body to go to another world, as one passes from one chain of dreams into another. ³² Look upon me, your petitioner, with kindness and grant me the favor I ask of you, because the great never refuse to grant the prayers of their suppliants. ³³ Grant that this virgin daughter of my minister may accompany me to the region where I shall be led so that we may have spiritual joy in each other’s company hereafter.”

³⁴ Saraswati said, “Go now, king, to the former palace of your past life and there reign without fear in the enjoyment of true pleasure. Know king that our visits never fail to fulfill the best wishes of our supplicants.”

Chapter 43 — The City Burning

Vasishta speaking:—

⁵ As the king and the goddess were going on with this sweet conversation, a man on horseback arrived before them in great hurry and confusion. ⁶ He said, “Lord! I come to tell that the enemy is showering darts and discs, swords and clubs upon us like rain, and they have been pressing upon us like a flood on all sides. ⁷ They have been raining their heavy weapons upon us at pleasure, like the impetuous gusts of a hurricane hurls down fragments of rocks from the heads of high hills. ⁸ There they have set fire to our fortress-like city and fires are burning on all sides like a wildfire. It is burning and engulfing houses with a hideous noise. ⁹ The smoke, rising like heaving hills, have covered the skies like a flood of clouds, and the flames of the fire leaping high resemble a garuda bird flying in the sky.”

¹⁰ Vasishta said:—

As the royal marshal was delivering this unpleasant intelligence with trepidation, there arose a loud cry from outside that filled the sky with its uproar: ¹¹ the twanging of bow strings drawn to the ears, the rustling of flying arrows flung with full force; the loud roaring of furious elephants, and the shrieks of frightened ones; ¹² gorgeous elephants bursting into the city with a clattering sound; and the high loud shouts of citizens, whose houses have burnt to the ground; ¹³ the falling and flying of burnt embers with a crackling noise; and the burning of raging fire with a hoarse sound. ¹⁴ All these were heard and seen by the goddesses and the king and his minister from an opening of the tent. The city was ablaze in the darkness of the night.

²⁶ The flaming fire was quenched after consuming the royal city to ashes, and the devouring flames ceased after they had reduced everything to cinders. ²⁷ The sudden outbreak of fire was like burglars breaking in to a house and upon its sleeping inhabitants. It made prey of everything that fell in its way.

Chapter 44 — Enlightened Leela Sees Viduratha's Queen Leela; Habits of the Mind Reproduce the Same Images

At this instant the great queen, who was in the bloom of youthful beauty, entered Viduratha's camp like the goddess of grace pops upon the lotus flower. ² She was decorated with hanging wreaths of flowers and necklaces, and accompanied by a train of her youthful companions and handmaids, all terrified with fear. ³ With her face as bright as the moon and her form as fair as the lily, she appeared like a star of heaven, her teeth shining like sets of stars and her bosom throbbing with fear.

¹⁶ "I see this prime minister with all these soldiers and citizens, these forces and vehicles, all to be the same as mine, and situated in the same place and manner as before. ¹⁷ How is it then, O goddess, that they came to be placed in this place? I see them as images placed within and outside the mirror of my mind, and know not whether these are living beings (or my imagination)."

¹⁸ Saraswati replied:—

All our external perceptions of things are the immediate effects of our internal conceptions of them. The intellect has the knowledge of all that can be perceived in it, just like the mind has the impressions of mental objects in itself. ¹⁹ The external world appears in an instant in the same form and manner to one who has its notion and impression in his intellect and mind, and no distance of time or place or any intermediate cause can create any difference in them. ²⁰ The inner world is seen on the outside, like the internal impressions of our minds appear to be seen outside us in our dreams.

Whatever is within, the same appears without, as with our dreams and desires and in all our imaginations and fancies of objects.

²¹ It is the constant habit of your mind that presents these things as realities to your sight. You saw your husband in the same state in which you thought he was when he died in that city of yours. ²² It is the same place where he now exists. Even now he is presented with the same objects of his thought as he had at that moment. Anything that appears to be different in this state comes from the turn of his mind of thinking it so before. ²³ All that appears real to him is the creation of his fancy and is as unreal as his dream or desire; for everything appears to be the same as it is thought of in the mind.

²⁷ So there is neither any entity nor a non-entity either. Both appear to us by turns as fallacies. For what after an kalpa aeon neither was nor will be cannot exist today or in any epoch (yuga), whether gone before or coming afterwards. ²⁸ That which is never non-existent is the ever existent Brahman, and That is the world. It is in Him that we see everything rise and fall by our fallacy, and what we falsely term as the creation or the created.

³¹ What reliance can there be in this dust of creation which is no more than the water of the mirage? When everything is united in that sole Unity, the knowledge of individualities is mere fallacy. ³² We see apparitions in the dark, though the darkness itself is no apparition. Our lives and deaths are the false notions of our error, and the entirety of existence is equally the production of gross error (maya). ³³ All this is Himself, for He is the great kalpa or will that produces everything. It is He who exists when all things are extinct in Him. Therefore these appearances are neither real nor unreal of themselves.

³⁴ But to say both real and unreal are Brahman is a contradiction. Therefore it is He who fills the infinity of space and abides equally in all things and their minutest particles. ³⁵ Wherever the spirit of Brahman abides, and even in the most minute living particle, It views the whole world in Itself, like one thinking on heat and cold of fire and frost has the same sensation within himself at that moment.

³⁹ But you must know all these modes and conditions of being belong only to material and not to the spirit, which is unconditioned and indivisible. ⁴⁰ There is no change or division of one's own soul, so there is no partition or variation of the Supreme Spirit. It is according to ideas in our minds that we see things in their different aspects before us.

⁴⁷ Such are the representations of your former ministers and citizens, imprinted as realities in your soul, together with the exact time and place and manner of their functions, as before. ⁴⁸ Because the consciousness of all things is present in the omniscient spirit of God, so the idea of royalty is inherent in the soul of the king. ⁴⁹ This notion of his goes before him like his shadow in the air, with the same stature and features and the same acts and movements as he had before.

⁵² Here is the sky containing the world in which you and I and this prince are situated like reflections of the One Ego only. Know all these are contained within the empty womb of Consciousness and remain as tranquil and transparent as emptiness itself.

Chapter 45 — The Second Leela Gets a Boon the First Didn't: How We Seek Is How We Obtain Know Leela, that this Viduratha, your husband, will lose his life in this battlefield and his soul will return to the tomb in the inner apartment where it will resume its former state.

Vasishta:—

² Upon hearing these words of the goddess, the second Leela, who was standing by, bent herself lowly before the goddess and addressed her with her folded palms. ³ The second Leela said, “Goddess! the genius of intelligence is ever adored by me and she gives me her visits in my nightly dreams. ⁴ I find you here exactly of her likeness. Therefore give me your blessing, O goddess with the beautiful face.”

⁵ Vasishta said:—

The goddess, being addressed by the lady in this way, remembered her faith and reliance in her, then politely spoke to the lady standing as a suppliant before her. ⁶ The goddess said, “I am pleased, my child, with your unflinching and undiminished adoration of me all your lifetime. Now say what you want of me.”

⁷ The second Leela said, “Ordain O goddess, that with this body of mine I may accompany my husband to whatever place he is destined to go after his death in the war.”

⁸ The goddess replied, “Be it so my child who has worshipped me with flowers, incense and offerings with all diligence and without fail.”

⁹ Vasishta said:—

The second Leela was cheered by this blessing of the goddess. The first Leela was much puzzled in her mind at the difference between their states. ¹⁰ The first Leela said, “Those who desire truth and they whose desires lean towards godliness have all their wishes fulfilled without delay and fail.

¹¹ Then tell me, goddess, why could I not keep company with my brahmin husband with my body of the brahmani, but had to be taken to him in the mountain home after my death.”

¹² The goddess answered saying:—

Know, O excellent lady, that I have no power to do anything. Everything happens according to the desire of the living being. ¹³ Know me only as the presiding divinity of wisdom, and I reveal everything according to my knowledge of it. It is by virtue of the intellectual powers exhibited in every being that it attains its particular end. ¹⁴ A living being has a certain development of mental powers and state when he desires an object. He attains that object according to the same development of mental powers and state.

¹⁵ You had attained the powers of your understanding by your devotion to my service. You have always desired from me that you be liberated from flesh. ¹⁶ Accordingly, I have awakened your understanding in that way, whereby you have been able to arrive at your present state of purity. ¹⁷ It was because of your constant desire for liberation that you have gained the same state by enlargement (of the powers) of your consciousness.

²¹ Truly the state of one's mind leads his internal soul to that state upon which it thinks, and to that prosperity which it attempts to obtain. ²² Now distinguish between what is desirable or disagreeable for you, and choose that which is holy and perfect, and you will certainly arrive at it.

Chapter 46 — Viduratha Counter-Attacks

¹ Rama said, “Tell me what Viduratha did after he got angry and left the ladies and the goddess having said what he did, and went out from the camp.”

² Vasishta said:—

Viduratha, accompanied by a large group of his companions, left his camp like the bright moon beset by a host of stars. ³ He was in armor and girt by laces and girdles. Dressed in his military clothing, he went forth amidst the loud war cry of sorrow to the vanquished, like God Indra going to battle. ⁴ He gave orders to the soldiers and was informed of the battle array.

Having given directions to his captains, he mounted his chariot. ⁵ It was adorned with equipment resembling the pinnacles of mountains and beset by five flags fringed with strings of pearls and gems, resembling a celestial car. ⁶ The iron hoops of its wheels flashed with their golden pegs, and the long and beautiful shaft of the car, rang with the tinkling of pearls which were suspended to it. ⁷ It was drawn by long necked, swift and slender horses of the best breed and auspicious marks. Their swiftness and bearing made them seem like they were flying in the air pulling a heavenly car with some god in it. ⁸ Impatient of the wind’s swiftness, they spurred them with their back heels and left them behind, and sped the forepart of their bodies as if to devour the air, impeding their course. ⁹ The car was drawn by eight war horses with their manes hanging down their necks like fans, and white spots or circlets resembling the discs of moon on their foreheads, and filling the eight sides around with their hoarse neighing.

²⁰ Viduratha collected his forces and, without considering the enemy’s superiority, pressed himself forward into them, as the great Mount Meru rushed into the waters of the great deluge. ²¹ Now the twanging of the bow strings emitted a clattering sound, and the enemy forces advanced in battle array like bodies of clouds with rainbows amidst them.²² Many kinds of missiles flew like falcons in the air. Black steel waved with a dark glare owing to the massacres they made.²³ Clashing swords striking against each another flashed with living flames of fire, and showers of arrows whistled like hissing rainfalls in the air.²⁴ Two edged saws pierced the bodies of the warriors, and the flinging weapons hurtled in the air, clashing and crashing each other.²⁵ The darkness of the night was put to flight by the blaze of the weapons. The entire army was pierced by arrows sticking like hairs on their bodies.²⁶ Headless trunks moved about like players in a horrid, solemn ritual of the god of death (Yama). Furies fled about at the violence of war, like raving girls at drunken revelries.²⁷ Elephants fighting with their tusks sent a clattering noise into the air. Stones flung from the slings flew like a flowing stream in the sky.²⁸ Bodies of men were falling dead on the ground like the dried leaves of forests blown away by wind. Streams of blood were running in the field of battle, as if the heights of war were pouring down the floods of death below.²⁹ The dust of the earth was set down by the floods of blood, and the darkness was dispelled by the blaze of weapons.

All clamor ceased in intense fighting, and the fear for life was lost under the stern resolution of death.³⁰ The fighting was stern without a cry or noise, like the pouring of rain in a breezeless sky. The glitter of swords in the darkened air was like the flashes of forked lightning in murky clouds.³¹ Darts were flying about with a hissing noise. Crowbars hit one another with a harsh sound. Large weapons struck each another with a jarring noise. The dreadful war raged direfully in the dim darkness of the night.

Chapter 47 — Saraswati Explains Why Sindhu Will Win; the Encounter of Sindhu & Viduratha

As the war was waging furiously between the two armies, the two Leelas addressed the goddess of knowledge and said, ² “Tell us, O goddess, what unknown cause keeps our husband from gaining victory in this war, in spite of your good grace to him and his repelling enemy elephants in the fighting.”

³ Saraswati replied:—

Know daughters that I was asked by Viduratha’s enemy to give him victory in battle, which your husband never craved of me. ⁴ He lives and enjoys his life as it was desired by him, while his antagonist gains the conquest according to his aim and object. ⁵ Knowledge is contained in the consciousness of every living being, and rewards every one according to the desire to which it is directed.

⁶ My nature, like that of all things, is as unchangeable as the heat of fire. So the nature of Viduratha’s knowledge of truth and his desire for liberation lead him to the like result. ⁷ The intelligent Leela will also be liberated with him, but not the unintelligent one who by her nature is still unprepared for that highest state of bliss.

⁸ Viduratha’s enemy, the King of Sindhu, has long worshipped me for his victory in war. Therefore the bodies of Viduratha and his wife must fall into his hands. ⁹ O girl, you will also have liberation like hers in course of time. But before that, this enemy of yours, the King of Sindhu, will reign victorious in this earth.

¹⁰ Vasishta said:—

As the goddess was speaking in this manner, the sun appeared on his rising hill to behold the wonderful sight of the forces fighting. ¹¹ The thick mists of night disappeared like the enemy Sindhu hosts and left Viduratha’s forces to glitter like stars at the approach of night. ¹² The hills and dales and the land and water gradually appeared to sight, and the world seemed to reappear to view from amidst the dark ocean of the deluge. ¹³ The bright rays of the rising sun radiated on all sides like streams of liquid gold and made the hills appear as they did the bodies of warriors besmeared with blood.

¹⁴ The sky seemed like an immense field of battle, stretched over by the radiant rays of the sun that made the warriors’ shining arms shake in a snake-like manner. ¹⁵ The helmets on their heads raised their lotus-like tops, and the rings about their ears blazed with their jeweled glare. ¹⁶ The pointed weapons were as fixed as the snouts of unicorns, and the flying darts fled about like butterflies in the air. The bloody field presented a picture of a ruddy dawn and dusk, and the dead bodies on the ground represented the figures of motionless saints in their yoga. ¹⁷ Necklaces hung on their necks like snakes, and armor covered their bodies like the skins of serpents. Flags were flying like crests of vines on high, and the legs of warriors stood like pillars in the field. ¹⁸ Their long arms were like tree branches, and the arrows formed a bush of reeds. The flash of weapons spread like a green meadow all around, while their blades blazed with the luster of the long-leaved ketaka flowers. ¹⁹ The long lines of weapons formed like rows of bamboo and bramble bushes. Their mutual clashing emitted sparks of fire like clusters of the red asoka flowers.

²⁰ Bands of spiritual masters (siddhas) were flying with their leaders away in the air to avoid the weapons that were blazing with the radiance of the rising sun, forming as it were, a city of gold on high. ²¹ The sky re-echoed to the clashing of darts and discuses, of swords and spears, and of mallets and clubs in the field, and the ground overflowed with streams of blood bearing away the bodies of the slain. ²² The land was strewn with crowbars, lances and spears, and with tridents and stones on all sides. Headless bodies were falling hideously, pierced by poles and pikes and other instruments of death.

³⁵ These missiles were falling as fully and as fast as rocks hurled down from high by gusts of blustering hurricanes. The meeting of the two warring powers was as the confluence of the Indus and the sea, with tremendous roaring, collision and clashing.

King Viduratha, finding the high shouldered king of Sindhu before him, was enraged like the raging sun, in his midday fury. ² The twanging of his bow resounded in the air on all sides, and growled as loudly as the howling of winds in the caverns of mountains. ³ He drew his arrows from his dark quiver and shot them like the rays of the sun rising from the womb of night. ⁴ Each arrow flung from the bowstring flew like thousands in the air, and fell like millions on the ground. ⁵ The King of Sindhu was equally expert in his archery, as both of these archers owed their skill with bows to the favor of Vishnu.

²⁴ Sindhu let fly his magic missile that was gift from a gandharva. It kept the army of his enemy all spell-bound except Viduratha himself. ²⁵ Struck with this weapon, the soldiers became as mute as moonstruck, staring in their looks, and appearing as dead bodies or as pictures in a painting. ²⁶ As the soldiers of Viduratha remained spellbound within their files, King Viduratha employed his instruments of a counter-charm to remove the spell. ²⁷ This awakened the senses of his men like morning twilight reveals a bed of lotuses, and the rising sun opens their closed petals to light.

The Sindhu king fired his rage at them like the raging. ²⁸ He flung his serpentine weapons upon them, which bound like a band around all their bodies, encircling the battle ground and air like snakes wrapped round crags and rocks. ²⁹ The ground was filled with snakes like a lake with the spreading stalks of lotuses, and the bodies of gigantic warriors were bound by them like hills by huge and horrible hydras. ³⁰ Everything was overpowered by the sharp power of the poison, and the inhabitants of the hills and forests were benumbed by the venomous infection. ³¹ The smart poison spread a fiery heat all around, and the frozen snows like fire-brands sent forth their burning particles which were blown by the hot winds in the air.

destructive darts flew on all sides in the air, and roared like the sea and the gigantic dark clouds of heaven. ⁴⁹ They were like the flames of bright fire, with their long licking tongues and ash-colored and smoky curls rising like white hairs on the head, and making a chat-chat sound like that of moist fuel burning. ⁵⁰ They wheeled round in circles in the air with a horrible tang-tang noise, now flaming as fire and now fuming as smoke, and then flying about as sparks of fire. ⁵¹ With mouths beset by rows of sprouting teeth like lotus stalks, and faces defaced by dirty and moldy eyes, their hairy bodies were like stagnate pools full of moss and weeds. ⁵² They flew about and flashed and roared aloud like dark clouds, while the locks of hairs on their heads glared like lightning in the midway sky.

⁵⁶ Then Sindhu discharged his fire arms which set fire to the sky, and began to burn down everything like the all destroying conflagration of the last day. ⁵⁷ They filled all the sides of air with clouds of smoke that seemed to hide the face of heaven under the darkness of hell. ⁵⁸ They set fire to the woods in the hills which burned like mountains of gold, while the trees appeared to bloom with yellow plumeria flowers all around. ⁵⁹ All the sides of the sky above, and the hills, woods and groves below, were enveloped in the flames, as if they were covered under the red powder of Holi with which Yama, the God of the underworld, was playing over the plain. ⁶⁰ The heaven-spreading flame burnt legions into a heap of ashes like an undersea fire consumes entire ships and fleets in the sea.

against the learned, and made the moist ground as dry as when sultry winds strew the forest land with dried leaves. ⁷³ It decorated the face of the ground with a golden color, like when the royal dames adorn themselves with yellow paint. ⁷⁴ It put the soldiers on the opposite side in a state of feverish fainting, like when the tender leaves of trees are scorched by the warmth of a wild fire in summer heat.

Chapter 49 — More Supernatural Weapons

¹² Sindhu then cast his demonic weapons as black as darkness, which fled as lines of horrid pisacha demons on all sides. ¹³ They filled the sky with the darkness of their bodies, and made the daylight turn to the shade of night, as if it were for fear of them. ¹⁴ They were as strong in their figures as huge columns of smoke, and as dark in their complexion as the blackest pitch, and tangible to the hand. ¹⁵ They were like lean skeletons with erect hair on their heads and bearded faces, with looks as pale as those of beggars, and bodies as black as those of the aerial and nocturnal fiends. ¹⁶ They were terrific and like idiots in their looks, and moved about with bones and skulls in their hands. They were as meager as churls, but more cruel than either the sword or thunderbolt. ¹⁷ The pisacha demon-ghosts lurk about woods, bogs and highways and pry into empty and open door houses. They hunt about like ghosts in their dark forms, and fly away as fast as fleeting lightning. ¹⁸ With fury they ran and attacked the remaining enemy forces that stood weaponless in the field with their broken and sorrowful hearts. ¹⁹ Frightened to death they stood motionless, and dropped down their arms and armor, and stood petrified as if they were demon-struck, with staring eyes, open mouths, and unmoving hands and feet. ²⁰ They let fall both their lower and upper garments, loosened their bowels and slackened their bodies through fear, and kept shaking like trees by the wind fired his rupika weapon with anger, which gave comfort to his own army and deluded the enemy pisacha force. ²⁴ These rupikas flew in the air with erect hairs on their heads, their terrific eyes sunk in their sockets. Their waists and breasts moved like trees with bunches of fruit. ²⁵ They had past their youth and become old. Their bodies were bulky and worn out with age. They had deformed backs and hips, and protuberant navels and naves. ²⁶ They had dark dusky bodies and held human skulls in their hands all besmeared with blood. They had bits of half devoured flesh in their mouths, and pouring out fresh blood from their sides. ²⁷ They had a variety of gestures, motions and contortions of their bodies, which were as hard as stone, with wry faces, crooked backs and twisted legs and limbs. ²⁸ Some had their faces like dogs, crows, and owls, with broad mouths and flat cheek-bones and bellies, and held human skulls and entrails in their hands. ²⁹ They laid hold of the pisachas like men catch little children, and joined with them in one body as their consorts. ³⁰ They joined together in dancing and singing with outstretched arms and mouths and eyes, now joining hand in hand and now pursuing one another in their merry sport. ³¹ They stretched their long tongues from their horrid mouths, and licked away the blood exuding from the wounds of the dead bodies. ³² They plunged in the pool of blood with as much delight as if they had dived into a pond of ghee. They scrabbled in the bloody puddle with outstretched arms and feet, and uplifted ears and nose. ³³ They rolled and jostled with one another in the puddle of carrion and blood, and made it swell like the Milky Ocean when churned by Mandara Mountain.

³⁷ The other monarch was not slow to show his magic skill by hurling his demon rakshasa weapon, which threatened to grasp and devour the three worlds. ³⁸ Their gigantic bodies rose as high as mountains, and with their ghostly forms, they seemed like hellish fiends appearing from the infernal regions. ³⁹ The ferocious body of the roaring rakshasas terrified both gods and demigods with their loud martial music and war dance of their headless trunks. ⁴⁰ The giddy vetalas, yakshas and kushmandas devoured the fat and flesh of dead bodies as their toast, and drank the gory blood as their lurid wine in the course of their war dance. ⁴¹ The hopping and jumping of the kushmandas in their war dance in streams of blood, scattered its crimson particles in the air, which assembled in the form of a bridge of red evening clouds over the sparkling sea.

Chapter 50 — The Death of Viduratha

As the tide of war was rolling violently with a general massacre on both sides, the belligerent monarchs thought on the means of saving their own forces from the impending ruin.² The magnanimous King of Sindhu, who was armed with patience, called to his mind the Vaishnava weapon, which was the greatest of arms and as powerful as Shiva himself.³ He hurled the Vaishnava weapon using his best judgment (mantra). Immediately it emitted a thousand sparks of fire from its flaming blade on all sides.⁴ These sparks became large balls as big and bright as to shine like hundreds of suns in the sky, and others flew like the lengthy shafts of cudgels in the air.⁵ Some of them filled the wide field of the sky with thunderbolts as thick as the blades of grass, and others spread over the lake of heaven with battle axes like a bed of lotuses.⁶ These poured forth showers of pointed arrows spreading like a net in the sky, and fired dark sword blades scattered like tree leaves in the air.

reduced to ashes by its flame. ²⁴ He then fled to the woods like a lion from its cavern in the mountain, and repelled the fire that pursued him by his aqueous weapons. ²⁵ After losing his car and alighting on the ground, he brandished his sword and cut off the hoofs and heels of the horses of his enemy's chariot in the twinkling of an eye. ²⁶ He hacked everything that came before him like the lean stalks of lotuses. Then Viduratha also left his chariot with his sword in hand.

⁴⁹ The body of Padma (alias Viduratha) was placed like a lotus in the presence of Saraswati, shining with the splendor of the sun. But the elated Sindhu was kept from entering that place, like a giddy fly from a flame. ⁵⁰ The enemy returned to his camp and the charioteer entered the apartment and placed the body on its death-bed in the presence of the goddess. The body was all mangled and besmeared with blood seeping from the pores of the severed neck.

The loud cry that the king was killed in battle by the rival monarch, struck the people with awe, and filled the realm with dismay. ² Carts loaded with utensils and household articles were driving through the streets. Women with their loud wailing were running away amidst the impassable paths of the city.

¹⁵ Loud trumpets proclaimed the victory of Sindhu in every city and announced his sole sovereignty all over the earth. ¹⁶ The high-shouldered Sindhu entered the capital like a second Manu for repopulating it after the all-devastating flood of war was over. ¹⁷ Then the tribute of the country poured into the city of Sindhu from all sides. These loaded on horses and elephants resembled the rich cargoes borne by ships to the sea. ¹⁸ The new king issued forthwith his circulars and royal edicts to all sides, struck coins in his own name, and placed his ministers as commissioners in all provinces. ¹⁹ His iron-rod was felt in all districts and cities like the inflexible rod of Yama, and it awed the living with fear of instant death. ²⁰ All insurrections and tumults in the realm soon subsided to rest under his reign, like the flying dust of the earth and the falling leaves of trees fall to the ground upon subsidence of a tempest.

²¹ The whole country on all sides was pacified to rest, like the perturbed sea of milk after it had been churned by Mandara Mountain. ²² Then there blew the gentle breeze of Malaya, unfurling the locks of the lotus-faced maidens of Sindhu's realm, and blowing the liquid fragrance of their bodies around, and driving away the unwholesome air of the carnage.

[The entire vision of Leela shows the state of human life, with its various incidents and phases to its last termination by death. The discontented brahmin longs for royal dignity, imagines all its enjoyments in the person of Padma, and at last in the character of Viduratha sees all its evils. The lesson is for aspirants to avoid aiming at high worldly honors which end in their destruction. In her silent meditation, Leela by her wisdom sees the whole course and vicissitudes of the world, and the rise and fall of human glory in the aspirations of her husband. — V. L. Mitra]

Chapter 52 — The Second Leela Reflects upon the First Leela's Own Self-Concept: Life after Death

In the meanwhile, O Rama, the first Leela saw her husband lying unconscious before her and about to breathe his last. She spoke to Saraswati, ² “Behold, O mother, my husband is about to shuffle his mortal coil in this perilous war that has laid waste his whole kingdom.”

This combat that you saw, fought with such fury and lasting so long in the field, was neither fought in your kingdom nor in any part of this earth. ⁴ It occurred nowhere except in the vacant space of the shrine containing the dead body of the brahmin where it appeared only as the phantom of a dream. ⁵ This land that appeared as the kingdom of your living lord Viduratha was situated with all its territories in the inner apartment of Padma. ⁶ Again it was the tomb of the brahmin Vasishtha, situated in the hilly village of Vindya, that showed these varying scenes of the mortal world within itself. ⁷ As the departed soul views the vision of the past world within its narrow tomb, so is the appearance of all worldly accidents unreal in their nature.

¹³ Error consists in taking the unreal for the real and in thinking the viewer and the view, or the subjective and objective, is different from each other. It is the removal of the distinction of the subjective and objective that leads us to the knowledge of unity (the one or Aum). ¹⁴ Know that the Supreme Soul is free from the acts of production and destruction, and it is His light that displays all things of which He is the source. Learn that the entire outer nature has no existence nor change in itself.

²³ Leela asked, “Tell me, O goddess, how was this lady endowed with my form? How did she come to be placed as my stepmother beside my deceased husband (Prince Padma)? ²⁴ Tell me in short, in what form do the people in Padma’s house see her, and how are they now talking to her?”

²⁵ The goddess replied:—

Leela, hear what I will tell you in brief answer to your question regarding the life and death of this Leela as an image of yourself.

³¹ Thus this Leela, you, and this King Viduratha are only phantoms of your fancy. So am I, unless I believe to exist in the self-existent spirit. ³² The belief of the existence of this king and his people, and of ourselves as united in this place, proceeds from the fullness of that Consciousness which fills everything.

³⁷ After the death of your husband (Padma), his soul caught the same reflection of your image as you did desire to be hereafter, and which you now see in the person of the young Leela before you.

⁴⁰ It was Padma's thought of his sure death, his false conception of the transmigration of his soul in the body of Viduratha, and your desired form of a youthful Leela, the idol of his soul, that represented the youthful Leela to Padma. ⁴¹ He saw you and you saw him according to your desires. Thus both of you, although possessed of the same unvaried soul that pervades all space, are made to see one another according to your desires.

⁴⁷ This is an example that shows our physical-sense perceptions to be no better than our dreams. It was in this deluded state of Leela's mind that she worshipped and prayed to me. ⁴⁸ In order to confer the boon on her that she might not become a widow, and by virtue of my blessing, this girl died before her husband's death. ⁴⁹ I am the progeny of Brahma, and the totality of that intelligence in which all beings participate. It is for this reason that she adored me as the guardian divinity of all living beings.

Chapter 53 — The Second Leela Visits the Temple of Dead King Padma; Representations of Memory Are Not the Creations of Brahma

The second Leela having obtained the blessing of the goddess, proceeded with her imagined body to meet her royal spouse in heaven beyond the skies. ² Having assumed her spiritual form which was as light as air, she fled merrily like a bird and was blown aloft by the fond desire of joining her beloved lord. ³ She met a maiden sent by the goddess of wisdom issuing out of the best model of her heart's desire. ⁴ The maiden said, "I am the daughter of your friend Saraswati. I welcome you, O beautiful lady, to this place. I have been waiting and expecting you here on your way through the sky."

⁵ Leela said, "Lead me, O lotus-eyed maid, to the side of my husband, as the visit of the good and great never goes for nothing."

⁶ Vasishta said:—

The maiden replied, "Come let us go there." So saying, she stood before her looking forward on her way. ⁷ Then both proceeding together onward, they came to the doorway of heaven which was as broad as the open palm of the hand and marked with lines like those read in palmistry. ⁸ They passed the region of the clouds and stepped over the currents of winds, then passing beyond the orbit of the sun, they reached the stations of the constellations. ⁹ From there they passed through regions of air and water to the worlds where gods and saints live, then they crossed over the worlds of Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva to the great circle of the universe. ¹⁰ Their spiritual bodies pierced through its opening like the humidity of ice water passes out of the pores of a tight water-jar. ¹¹ Leela's body was of the form of her mind, which was of the nature of its own bent and tenor, and conceived these wanderings within itself.

²⁴ The goddess replied:—

It was by our gift of wisdom to them that this lady, that king and those servants found themselves to share in the one and same intellectual soul in which they all existed. ²⁵ Every soul is a reflection of Divine Consciousness and is destined by his own fixed decree to represent individual souls to one another like refractions of the same, or like shadows in a magic show. ²⁶ Thus the king received his wife as his companion and queen, and his servants as related with himself. ²⁷ He saw the unity of his soul with hers and theirs, and no distinction existing between anyone of them. He was astonished to find that there was nothing distinct in them from what he had in himself.

²⁸ The waking, first Leela said, “Why did not that Leela meet her husband in her own body according to her request and the boon that was granted to her?”

²⁹ The goddess replied:—

It is not possible for unenlightened souls (such as that of the young Leela) to approach holy spirits in person. They are visible and accessible only to the deserving. They are unapproachable by gross bodies as sunlight is inaccessible by a shadow. ³⁰ So the established law from the beginning of creation is that intelligent souls can never join with dull beings and gross matter, as truth can never be mixed with falsehood. ³¹ And so is that as long as a boy is prepossessed of his notion of a ghost, it is vain to try to convince him of the falsehood of demons as mere shadows of his imagination. ³² And as long as the feverish heat of ignorance rages within the soul, it is impossible for the coolness of the moon of intelligence to spread over it. ³³ So long also as one believes himself composed of a physical body incapable of travel in the higher atmosphere, it is impossible to make him believe otherwise.

Chapter 54 — Divine Laws underlie Creation; Death as Reward; Life Durations

Therefore, those who know the knowable God and rely upon virtue can go to spiritual worlds — not others. ² All material bodies are false, the false conceptions of the mind. They can have no place in Truth, just like no shadow can have any room in sunshine. (So gross matter has no room in the subtle spirit.) ³ Young Leela, being ignorant of the knowable (God) and unacquainted with the highest virtue (the practice of yoga meditation), could go no further than the city of her lord which she had in her heart.

⁴ The waking Leela said, “Let her be where she is, but I will ask you about other things. You see here that my husband is about to die. Tell me, what must I now do? ⁵ Tell me the law of being and not being of beings, and about that destiny which destines living beings to death. ⁶ What determines the natures of things and gives existence to the categories of objects? What causes the warmth of fire and sun and gives stability to the earth? ⁷ Why is coldness confined to frost and the like, and what forms the essence of time and space? What are the causes of the different states of things and their various changes, and the causes of the solidity of some and minuteness of others? ⁸ What causes trees and men to be taller than grass and brambles, and why do many things dwindle and decay in the course and capability of growth?”

⁹ The goddess said:—

At the universal dissolution of the world, when all things are dissolved in the formless void, only the essence of Brahman remains in the form of infinite sky stretching on all sides beyond the limits of creation. ¹⁰ Then it reflects in its consciousness in the form of a spark of fire, as you are conscious of your aerial journey in a dream. ¹¹ Then this atomic spark in the Divine Spirit increased in size, and having no substance of itself, appeared as what is commonly called the ideal world.

¹² The spirit of God thought itself as Brahma, the soul of the world, who reigned over it in his form of the mind, as if it was identical with the real world itself. ¹³ Whatever primary laws he appointed to all things at their first creation, they invariably continue in force with them to the present time. ¹⁴ The minds of all turn as willed by the Divine Mind. There is nothing which of itself can go beyond the law assigned to it by the Divine Will.

real, just like the shadow seems to be of substance. Our notions of things are the properties of our nature. ²² The manner in which Consciousness exhibited itself in its different manifestations at the beginning, the same continues in its course to this time and is known as the manifestations of consciousness (samvid-kachana) or the course or system of the universe which constitute the niyati.

²⁵ We are conscious of our dreams in some particular state of our consciousness, and it is the wonderfully cunning nature of consciousness that makes us think the unreal to be real. ²⁶ The ideas of the reality of earth, air, fire and water are all false. Consciousness perceives them within itself as its false dreams and desires and daydreams.

³⁴ Leela said, "Tell me in short, O moon-faced goddess, something more with regard to death. Is it a pleasure or pain to die? What becomes of us after we are dead and gone from here?"

³⁵ The goddess replied:—

Dying men are of three kinds, and they have different ends upon their death. There are the ignorant, those practiced in yoga, and those who are reasonable and religious. ³⁶ Those practicing dharana yoga (fixed concentration in meditation) may go wherever they like after leaving their bodies, and so the yogi of reason is at liberty to range everywhere. ³⁷ He who has not practiced dharana yoga, or has not applied himself to reasoning, or entertains certain hopes for the future is called an ignorant sot and meets with the pain and pangs of death.

³⁸ He whose mind is not subdued and is full of desires, temporal cares and anxieties becomes as distressed as a lotus torn from its stalk. ³⁹ The mind that is not guided by the precepts of the scriptures or purified by holiness but is addicted to the society of the wicked is subjected to the burning sensation of fire within itself at the moment of death. ⁴⁰ At the moment when the last gurgling of the throat chokes the breath, eyesight is dimmed and the countenance fades away, then the rational soul also becomes hazy in its consciousness.⁴¹ A deep darkness spreads over the dimming sight and stars twinkle before it in daylight. The sky appears to be hidden by clouds and presents a gloomy aspect on every side.⁴² An acute pain seizes his entire body, and a mirage caused by witchcraft dances before his vision. The earth is turned into air and the dying person seems to be moving in midair.⁴³ The sphere of heaven revolves before him and the tide of the sea seems to bear him away. He is lifted up in the air, then hurled down as in his state of dizziness or dream.⁴⁴ Now he thinks he is falling into a dark pit, and then he is lying in the cave of a hill. He wants to talk out loud about his torments, but his speech fails to utter his thoughts.

⁴⁵ Now he finds himself as if falling down from the sky, and now as whirled in the air like a bundle of straw blown aloft by a gust of wind. He is now riding swiftly as in a car, and now finds himself melting like snow.⁴⁶ He desires to tell his friends about the evils of life and this world, but he is carried away from them as rapidly as if by an air-engine.⁴⁷ He whirls about like a turning wheel and he is dragged along like a beast by its halter. He wallows about like in an eddy, or turns around as the machine of some engine.⁴⁸ He is borne like straw in the air and is carried about like a cloud in the wind. He rises high like vapor, then falls down like a heavy watery cloud pouring out into the sea.⁴⁹ He passes through endless space and revolves in all of its vortices of emptiness to find, as it were, a place free from the ups and downs to which earth and ocean are subject.⁵⁰ Thus the rising and falling spirit wanders ceaselessly, and the soul breathing hard and sighing without break sets the whole body in sore pain and agony.⁵¹ By degrees the objects of his senses become as faint to his failing organs as the landscape fades to view with the setting of the sun.

⁵² At this moment, his memory fails and he loses memories of the past and present, like one is at a loss to know the sides of the compass after the evening twilight has passed away.⁵³ In his fainting fit, his mind loses its power of thinking. He is lost in a state of ignorance, the loss of all his thoughts and consciousness.⁵⁴ In this fainting state, the vital breath ceases to circulate through the body. When its circulation stops completely, a swoon into unconsciousness (murcha) follows.⁵⁵ When this state of unconscious paralysis combined with delirium has reached its climax, then by the law of inertia, ordained for living beings from the beginning, the body becomes as stiff as stone.

⁵⁶ Leela said, "But tell me, O goddess, why do these pains and agonies, this fainting and delirium, and disease and unconsciousness overtake the body, when it is possessed of all of its eight organs intact?"

⁵⁷ The goddess replied:—

It is the law appointed by the Author of life from the first, that such and such pains are to fall as the lot of living beings at such and such times.⁵⁸ The primeval sin springs of itself like a plant in the conscious heart of man and subjects him to his doomed miseries which have no other intelligible cause.⁵⁹ When disease and its pain overpower the body and prevent lungs and arteries from expanding and contracting to inhale and exhale air, the body loses its equilibrium (samana) and becomes restless.⁶⁰ When inhaled air does not come out and exhaled breath does not re-enter the lungs, all pulsation is at a stop. Organic sensations are lost, remaining only in memory.⁶¹ When vital air does not enter or exit, the pulse sinks and becomes motionless. The body is said to become senseless, and life to be extinct.

⁶² I also shall die in my destined time, but all my consciousness of former knowledge will be awake at the hour of death. ⁶³ Though I am dead and gone from here in this manner, yet I must mind that the seed of my innate consciousness (the soul) is never destroyed with my life and body. ⁶⁴ Consciousness is inner knowledge and is imperishable in its nature. Therefore the nature of consciousness is free from birth and death. ⁶⁵ In some persons this consciousness is as clear as a fresh fountain; in others as foul as tide water. In some it is bright in its form of the pure intellect (chit); but in many in its nature of the sentient or individual soul (chetana), it is polluted with the passions of animal life.

Say, what other thing is this soul called purusha besides consciousness itself? ⁶⁹ Tell me then, who and what are you calling dead today? Is consciousness subject to disease or death at anytime and in any form? Truly millions of living bodies are dying every day, but consciousness always remains imperishable. ⁷⁰ Consciousness never dies at the death of any living being because the entire individual soul continues the same upon the death of everybody here.

⁷¹ Therefore, the individual soul is nothing more than the principle which is conscious of its various desires, affections and passions. It is not that principle to which men attribute the phases of life and death. ⁷² So there is none that dies and no one is born at anytime. It is this only living principle that continually revolves in the deep eddy of its desires. ⁷³ Considering the unreality of visible phenomena, there can be no desire for them in anyone. But the inner soul that is led by its egoism and believes them to be true is subject to death at the disappearance of phenomena.

Chapter 55 — Categories of Death Experiences; Origin of Illusion

¹ Leela said, “Tell me, goddess, for edification of my knowledge, how does a living come to die and is reborn in another form?”

² The goddess replied:—

As the action of the heart ceases and the lungs blow and breathe no more, the current of vital airs is utterly stopped and the living being loses its consciousness. ³ But the intellectual soul, which has no rise or fall, remains ever the same as it abides in all moving and unmoving bodies, and in air, water, fire and vacuum. ⁴ When the breathing, pulse and motion of the body stop, it is said to be dead and is then called an inert corpse. ⁵ The body being a dead carcass and the vital breath having mixed with the air, the soul is freed from the bonds of its desires. It flies to and remains in the mode of the discrete and self-existent soul.

⁶ The individual soul, called the animal spirit (jiva), has its desires and is other than the atman (soul). It remains in its burial tomb under the same atmosphere as the soul of Padma, which you saw hovering about his tomb. ⁷ Hence such departed spirits are called ghosts of the dead (pretas). They have their desires and earthly propensities attached to them, just like the fragrance of the flower is concentrated in its pollen and thence diffused through the air.

¹¹ Departed spirits are classed in six orders, as you shall now hear from me. These are the great, greater and greatest sinners, and likewise the three degrees of the virtuous. ¹² These are again subdivided into three kinds, some belonging to one state and others composed of two or three states in the same individual soul.

whether long or short, are made to return on earth to feel the evils of brutish and beastly lives.

³⁹ The fetus then becomes either well-formed or deformed, according to the good or evil deeds of the person in its past state, and brings forth the infant of a good or ill shaped appearance. ⁴⁰ It then perceives the moonlike beauty of youthful bloom, and its amorous disposition comes upon itself. Afterwards it feels the effects of hoary old age, defacing its lotus-like face like the sleets of snow shatter and shrivel the lotus leaflets. ⁴¹ At last it undergoes the pains of disease and death and feels the same lack of physical senses at of death as before, and finds itself again as in a dream taking on a new form. ⁴² It again believes itself to be carried to the region of Yama, and subjected to the former kinds of revolution. Thus it continues to conceive its reincarnation in endless births and various forms.

⁴³ Thus forever in its own ethereal sphere, the aerial spirit goes on thinking about all its ceaseless reincarnations until its final liberation from this ever changing state.

⁴⁴ Leela said, "Tell me kindly, O good goddess, for the enlightenment of my understanding, how did this misconception of its changeableness first come upon the soul in the beginning?"

⁴⁵ The goddess replied:—

The dense appearance of the abstract causes us to assume the discrete spirit in the concrete forms of the earth and sky and rocks and trees. ⁴⁶ As Divine Consciousness manifests itself as the soul and model of all forms, so we see these manifestations in the transcendental sphere of its pure consciousness.

⁴⁷ In the beginning, God conceived himself as the lord of creation (Brahma). Then, as it were in a dream, he saw in himself all the forms as they continue to this time. ⁴⁸ These forms were manifested in the Divine Spirit, at first as his will, and then reflected and exhibited in the phenomenal world in all their present forms. ⁴⁹ Among these some are called living beings which are able to move their bodies and limbs and live by means of the air they breathe and circulate in their bodies through lungs and arteries.

⁵³ It is according to one's estimation of himself that he has his proper and peculiar desires, and also the particular form of his body. Such also is the case of the elemental bodies, from their inner conception of their peculiar natures. ⁵⁴ Thus all moving and unmoving things have their movable and immovable bodies according to their intrinsic disposition or idiosyncrasy as such and such. ⁵⁵ Hence all self-moving beings have their movable bodies conforming to the conception of their natures as so and so. And in this state of their belief, they continue to this time with their same inborn or congenital bodies.

their various natures and forms as they have to this time. ⁵⁹ The inner constitution of all immovable objects makes them remain in their stationary states; likewise for all other substances, according to their different names and natures. ⁶⁰ Thus the inner constitution or quality of worms and insects makes them conceive themselves according to their different kinds and gives them their particular natures forever.

⁶⁹ Look, here this King Viduratha is about to breathe his last, and the garlands of flowers heaped on the corpse of your husband Padma are now being hung upon the breast of Viduratha.

⁷⁰ Leela said, “Tell me goddess, how did Viduratha enter Padma’s tomb? How can we also enter to see what he is doing there?”

⁷¹ The goddess said:—

Man goes to all places by the way of his desires, even thinking that he goes to a distant future, in the spiritual form of pure consciousness. ⁷² We shall go the same way, as you like, because the bond of our friendship makes no difference in our choice and desires.

⁷³ Vasishtha said:—

Princess Leela was relieved of her pain by what Goddess Saraswati had explained. Her intellectual sight was brightened by the blazing sun of spiritual light. She saw the unconscious and unmoving Viduratha breathe out his final breath.

Chapter 56 — State of the Soul after Death; Ancestor Worship & Benefits to the Dead

In the meantime the king's eyeballs became convoluted, and his lips and cheeks and entire face grew pale and dry. There remained only the slender breath of life in him. ² His body became as lean as a dry leaf, and his face turned as ghastly as the figure of death. His throat gurgled like the hoarsest beetles and his lungs breathed with a bated breath. ³ His sight was darkened upon the unconsciousness of death and his hopes were buried in the pit of despair. The sensations of his external organs were hidden within the cavity of his heart. ⁴ His figure was as senseless as a picture in painting and all his limbs were as motionless as those of a statue carved from a block of marble. ⁵ What need is there of a lengthier description when it may be said in short that his life quitted his body, like a bird flies far away from a falling tree?

¹⁶ The individual soul of the king sailing through the sky did not see the forms of the two ladies who followed it, though they saw it all along its course. ¹⁷ They passed through many worlds and soon passed beyond the bounds of the extra-mundane systems until they arrived at the solar world from where they descended to this earth.

²⁰ Rama asked, "How was it sage, that they entered into the abode adjoining to the tomb, and how could they find the way to it? One had been dead a long time, and all three were bodiless emptiness."

²¹ Vasishta replied:—

The tomb of the king's dead body, being impressed on his soul and the object of its desire, led his spirit insensibly to it, as if by its inborn instinct.

A man having the desire settled in his heart to receive food offerings, and thinking it to be offered to him, is surely benefitted by its offering. ²⁸ Whatever is in the heart and mind, the same notions form the nature of living beings. Whether these are in their corporeal or incorporeal states, they think themselves as such beings and no other. ²⁹ The thought of having received the pinda cake (cake offered at a shradh ancestor worship ritual) makes a man sapinda (ancestors to the sixth degree), though it is not actually offered to him. On the other hand, the thought of not being served with the cake makes a sapinda become a nispinda.

³⁰ It is truly the desire of all living beings to be whatever they have in their hearts, and that is the cause of their becoming so in reality. ³¹ It is a man's thought that makes poison taste like nectar, and it is his very thought that makes an untruth seem as truth to him. ³² Know this for certain, that no thought ever rises in anyone without some cause or other. Therefore, the desire or thought that is inherent in the spirit is the sole cause of its regeneration on earth. ³³ Nobody has ever seen or heard of any event occurring without its proper cause; except the being of the Supreme Being which is the causeless cause of all beings from their state of not-being into being.

³⁴ Desire is inherent in consciousness, like a dream in the soul. Desire appears in the form of acts, as the Will of God is manifested in his works of creation.

³⁵ Rama said, “How can a spirit that is conscious of its faults foster any desire for its future good? How can it benefit from others' pious works for its salvation? ³⁶ Tell me also whether the pious acts of others, offered to ancestors, go for nothing. Do the good wishes of others have any effect on the future prospects of an undeserving ghost?”

³⁷ Vasishta said:—

A desire naturally arises in its proper time and place and by application of appropriate acts and means. The rising of the desire necessarily overcomes its absence. ³⁸ Pious gifts made for the sake of departed souls accrue to them as their own acts. It gives them a sense of worthiness and fills them with better hopes and desires for their future state.

⁴⁰ Rama said, “If the desire arises in its proper time and place, then how could it arise in the beginning when there was no time or place? ⁴¹ You say that there are accessory causes that give rise to desires, but how could the will arise in the first place without any accessory cause whatever?”

⁴² Vasishtha replied:—

It is true, O long-armed Rama, that there was neither time nor place in the beginning when the Spirit of God was without its will. ⁴³ And there being no accessory cause, there was not even the idea of the visible world, nor was it created or brought into existence. It is so even now.

⁴⁴ The phenomenal world has no existence. All that is visible is the manifestation of Divine Consciousness which is everlasting and imperishable. ⁴⁵ Later I will explain this to you in a hundred different ways, and it is my main purpose to do so, but now hear now tell you what relates to the matter under consideration.

⁴⁶ Having arrived in that house, they saw its inside beautifully decorated with garlands of flowers as fresh as those of the spring season. ⁴⁷ The palace residents were quietly employed in their duties, and the king’s corpse was placed upon a bed of mandara and kunda flowers. ⁴⁸ Wreaths of the same flowers were strewn over the sheet that covered the body and there were the auspicious pots of water placed bedside. ⁴⁹ The doors of the room were closed and the windows were shut fast with their latches. Lamps cast a dim light on the white washed walls and the corpse was lying as a man in sleep with the suppressed breathing of his mouth and nostrils.

Chapter 57 — Yogis' Astral Bodies; Phenomena of Dreaming

There they saw the younger Leela of Viduratha who had arrived there after her death and before the death of that king. ² She was in her former habit and mode with the same body, and the same tone and tenor of her mind. She was also as beautiful in all her features as in her former graceful form and figure when living. ³ She was the same in every part of her body and wore the same clothes as before. She had the same ornaments on her body, with the difference that it was sitting quietly in the same place, and not moving about as before.

¹⁰ Rama said, "You have said, O sage, that the first Leela had returned there in her fancy and spiritual form, by the favor of the goddess of wisdom. ¹¹ Why do you now describe her as having a body? I want to know how it came to her."

¹² Vasishta replied:—

Rama, what is this body of Leela? It is no more true than a false imagination of her gross spirit, like that of water in the mirage. ¹³ It is spirit alone that fills the world, and all bodies are creations of fancy. This spirit is the Intellect of God, and full of joy in itself.

¹⁴ The same understanding which Leela had of herself at her end accompanied her to her future state. The same notion of her body followed her there, even though the body itself was reduced to dust, like ice melted in water. ¹⁵ Spiritual bodies are also sometimes liable to fall into error and think themselves to be material bodies, just like we mistake a rope for the serpent.

¹⁶ The belief in anyone's materiality, composed of earth and other elements, is as false as believing rabbits have horns on their heads. ¹⁷ Whoever thinks he has become a stag in his dream has no need to seek another stag so that he can compare himself with it. ¹⁸ An untruth appears as truth at one time and disappears at another, just like the error of a snake in a rope vanishes upon the knowledge of its falsehood. ¹⁹ So the knowledge of the reality of all things in the minds of the unenlightened is dispersed in the minds of the enlightened upon conviction of their unreality. ²⁰ But the ignorant who have a belief in the reality of this world of dreams also believe in the reincarnation of the animal soul, like the revolution of the world on its own axis.

²¹ Rama asked, “If the bodies of yogis are of a spiritual nature, how is it that they are seen walking about in the sight of men?”

²² Vasishta replied:—

A yogi may take various forms upon himself without the destruction of his former body, like the human soul in a dream may deem itself transformed into a stag or any other being without undergoing any change in its spiritual essence. ²³ A yogi’s spiritual body is invisible to all, although he may make it appear as visible to their sight. It is like particles of frost seen in sunbeams, and like the appearance of a white spot in autumn sky.

²⁴ Nobody can easily discern the features of a yogi’s body, nor are they discernible by other yogis. They are as imperceptible as the features of a bird flying in the air. ²⁵ It is from the error of judgment that men think some yogis are dead and others living, but their spiritual bodies are never subject to death or common sight. ²⁶ The embodied soul is subject to errors from which the souls of yogis are free because their knowledge of truth has cleansed the mistake of a snake in the rope from their souls.

²⁸ Rama said, “Does the embodied soul takes a spiritual form or is it something else? Tell me this and remove my doubt.”

²⁹ Vasishta said:—

I have told you this repeatedly, my good Rama! How is it that you do not understand it yet? There exists only the spiritual body and the material form is nothing.

³⁰ It requires a habit of constant meditation in order to know your spiritual state and subdue your sense of materiality. As you abstain from your sense of materiality, so you attain the spiritual state. ³¹ Then there will be an end of your sense of gravity and solidity of objects, like the visions of a dreaming man disappear when he awakens.

³⁹ Vasishta answered:—

They took the sorrowful queen to be some friend of the king, having come from some place they knew not what or where. ⁴⁰ They did not like to examine the matter because it is the nature of the ignorant, like that of brutes, to believe what they see without investigation or consideration of its nature.

⁴³ Rama said, “Tell me sage, where does a hill that we dream of hide upon our waking? Kindly remove my doubt like the wind disperses the clouds of autumn.”

⁴⁴ Vasishtha said:—

All things that appear in dream or reside in our desires, such as a hill or the like, are absorbed in the consciousness from where they sprang, just like the motion of bodies subsides in the air that gives them vibration. ⁴⁵ As the motion of the air mixes with the fixed ether, so dreams and desires set in the unchanging soul from where they arose.

⁴⁶ Our dreams, like our knowledge of all other things, are made known to us by our consciousness, the nature of which is as unknown to us as that of the inner soul. ⁴⁷ We do not find our dreams or desires to be distinct from our awareness of them. They appertain to it in the same way as fluidity to water and motion to air. ⁴⁸ Whatever difference may appear to exist between dreams and our awareness of them is the effect of sheer ignorance. This gross ignorance is the characteristic of this world known as the phantom of fancy. ⁴⁹ It is impossible to conceive of two co-eternal and co-existent causes together, so it is wrong to suppose the dream as a distinct existence or anything other than an act of our consciousness.

Chapter 58 — The Two Leelas See Padma Revived

Meantime, the goddess of wisdom stopped the course of Viduratha's life, like we stop the flight of our minds at will.

² Leela said, "Tell me, goddess, how much time has lapsed since the corpse of the king was laid in this tomb, and I was absorbed in my deep meditation?"

³ The goddess replied:—

A month has passed since these your maid servants have been waiting here watching your body, which they thought lay asleep in the room. ⁴ Hear, excellent lady, what has become of your body after a fortnight when it became rotten and evaporated in the air. ⁵ Seeing your lifeless corpse, as cold as frost lying on the ground and turning as dry as a log of wood, or rather as a withered leaf on the floor, ⁶ the royal ministers thought you had committed suicide and removed your putrid carcass out of the room. ⁷ What more shall I say than they laid your corpse on a heap of sandalwood and, having set fire to the pile with a sprinkling of ghee, they quickly reduced it to ashes.

⁸ Then the family raised a loud cry that their queen was dead. They wept bitterly for sometime, after which they performed your funeral ceremonies. ⁹ Now when they will see you coming here in your same body, they must be astonished and think that you have returned from the next world of the dead. ¹⁰ Now my daughter, when you appear before them in this your purer and spiritual form, they must look upon you with astonishment. ¹¹ For you have not your former form at present, but it is changed to a purer one, agreeably to the desire and temperament of your mind. ¹² For everyone sees everything outside himself according to his inner feelings as, for example, the sight of shadowy ghosts is frequent to children who have a fear of devils at heart.

¹³ Now, O beautiful lady! You are an adept in spiritualism and you have a spiritual body on you. You have forgotten and forsaken your former body and all the desires coexisting with it. ¹⁴ Those who see spirit do not see material bodies. Their intelligent view is to see material bodies in the light of autumn clouds which are void of substance. ¹⁵ Upon attainment of the spiritual state, the material body becomes like an empty cloud, or like a flower without its fragrance. ¹⁶ When a man of pure desire is conscious of his attainment of the spiritual state, he loses the memory of his material body, like a youth forgets his embryonic state.

¹⁷ It is now the thirty-first day that we have arrived at this place, and I have caused these maid servants to fall into a deep sleep this morning. ¹⁸ Now Leela, let us go before the willful Leela and use our will to let her discover the form of the truthful Leela and see how she behaves towards you.

¹⁹ Vasishta said:—

So saying, they wished themselves to be perceived by the willful Leela, and stood before her in their ethereal forms of goddess and her inspired dame. ²⁰ At this instant, the Leela of Viduratha looked at them with staring eyes and found the room lighted up by the full luster of their bodies. ²¹ The apartment seemed to be lighted by the bright orb of the moon, and its wall seemed washed with liquid gold. The ground floor shone as if paved with ice, and all was full of splendor.

²² After seeing the brightness of the bed chamber, Leela looked up at the goddess and the other Leela and rising respectfully before them, she fell at their feet. ²³ “Be victorious, O ye goddesses!” she said. “You have blessed me with your visit. You who know all, know that I have come here first to prepare your way.” ²⁴ As she was speaking this way, they received her with good grace, and then all three in their youthful bloom sat together on bedding, like luxuriant vines on the snow capped peak of Mount Meru.

²⁶ The younger Leela answered, “As I lay unconscious on that spot, upon the shock of my death, I was enveloped in darkness like the new moon and I felt myself burned away by the flame of the funeral fire. ²⁷ I had no sense or thought of anything good or bad, but remained with my eyes closed under my eyelids. ²⁸ Then immediately after I had recovered from my trance of death, O great goddess, I found myself assuming (by mistake a new body agreeably to my former impression) and moving into the midst of the sky.”

³⁴ The goddess spoke, “Now I tell you Leela, who has such beautiful eyes and moves like a swan, that I will raise the corpse of the king to life from his bed.” ³⁵ Saying so, she breathed the breath of life like the lotus lets off its fragrance. It fled into the nostrils of the carcass like a creeping plant crawls into a hole. ³⁶ It entered into the heart through the vital sheath, as wind penetrates into the hole of bamboo. The breath of life was filled with desires, like the waves of the sea sparkle with pearls.

⁴³ The two Leelas responded saying, “Your commands.” He saw the two Leelas in attendance upon him, humbly bending themselves at his feet. ⁴⁴ Both were of the same form and features and of like demeanor and deportment towards him. They were alike to one another in their voice and action, as in their joy and gladness at his rising.

⁴⁵ Then looking at them he asked, “What are you and who is she?”

At this the elder Leela responded, “Please hear what I have to say. ⁴⁶ I am Leela, your former consort. I was joined with you as two in one, as sounds and their senses are combined together. ⁴⁷ The other Leela is only a reflection of me, cast by my free will for your service.”

⁵² As he was saying so, the goddess touched him with her hand and said, “My son, be possessed of your desired blessings and gain your blessed abode in future. ⁵³ Let all evils and evil thoughts be far from you, and all your discomforts be dispersed from this place. Let an everlasting joy descend in your hearts and a great population fill your happy realm. May all prosperity attend on you forever.”

Chapter 59 — Padma & Two Leelas Live Out Their Liberated Lives

“Be it so,” said Saraswati and disappeared into the air, and people awoke that morning with their king restored to life. ² Padma embraced the reborn Leela, who embraced him in her turn. They were exceedingly glad in their coming to life again.

Chapter 60 — Time & Reality Are Relative

Prince, I have told you this story in order to remove your error of the phenomenal world. Remember this tale of Leela and renounce your misconception of the gross material world.

² The substantiality of phenomena is a nothing by itself. No pains are required to invalidate it. It is hard to disprove a reality, but there is no difficulty to efface a falsehood from the mind. ³ True knowledge consists in seeing phenomena as void and knowing the one emptiness to the sole unity and real entity. In the end, one loses himself in this infinite emptiness.

⁴ When the self-born Brahma created the world from nothing, without the aid of any material or elemental body, it is obvious that there was an eternal void and that all these are only manifestations of the empty soul. ⁵ The same creative soul spread the seeds of its consciousness into the stream of creation, and these produce the images as they constantly appear to us, unless we take the pains to repress them. ⁶ The appearance of the world is only a perspective of the environment that is Divine Consciousness. It is contained in the small space of human consciousness within the soul, like in a transparent particle of sand.

⁹ Rama said, “What a wonderful explanation of the world that you have given me! It refreshes my soul, like moonbeams revive the blades of grass that have been burnt down by a fire. ¹⁰ After so long, I have come to know the truly knowable: such as what and how it is, and the manner how, from where, and when it is to be known. ¹¹ I have my peace and rest in pondering on this wonderful theory, and your elucidation of the doctrines of the Sruti scriptures.”

¹⁶ Vasishta said:—

Know sinless Rama, that whoever thinks of anything in any manner at any place or time, he comes to feel the same in the same manner, and in the same place and time.

²⁰ When our consciousness represents a twinkling of the eye to extend over a kalpa age, we are led to believe a single moment is an age of long duration. ²¹ When we are conscious of or think a kalpa age to be only a twinkling, the kalpa age is thought to pass as quickly as a moment. A long night in our unconscious sleep appears as a moment upon waking. ²² The night appears to be a long age to the long suffering sick, while it seems like a moment in the nightly revels of the merry. So a moment appears as an age in the dream, and an age passes off as a moment in the state of unconsciousness.

²⁷ There is no substance and no substantive world in the mind of the meditative yogi to whom the sweet pleasures of the world appear bitter, as they are thought to be the bane of his true joy. ²⁸ The bitter seems to be sweet by being thought to be so. What is unfavorable becomes favorable as that which is friendly comes to be unfriendly by being taken in their opposite senses.

³⁹ The Divine Spirit's great monument is the figure of the created world carved in itself, as if I see a troop of soldiers passing before me in my dream. ⁴⁰ This waking world sleeps in the soul of Brahma and rises in his mind like the plant world springs from sap lying hidden in the earth that gives it its growth and spring bloom. ⁴¹ Likewise, creation lies hidden in and springs from the Supreme Spirit, like the brightness of gold ornaments is contained in and comes out of the material metal.

⁴⁵ The causality of the One and the unreality of the world cannot both be true (since nothing unreal can come out of the real). Except Brahman, there is no other cause, whether Brahma the Creator or any other. The Divine Consciousness is the only cause and substance of its productions.

⁴⁷ Vasishtha said:—

All other thoughts are associated with the principal one in the intellect, in the same manner as high winds accompany a storm.

⁶² There is only one Being (sat) who is holy and without beginning and who, though he appears to have forms of light and darkness, and of space and time, never rises or sets anywhere. He is without beginning, middle or end. He remains like a vast expanse of water exhibiting itself in its waves and currents. ⁶³ The notion of myself, yourself and the objective world are only expressions of our perverted understandings. It is only ignorance within the sheath of the mind, according as it imagines it to be, that shows the One as many.

Chapter 61 — On the Origin of the World

¹ Rama said, “Please sage, explain to me how this error of believing in an objective world arises without a cause for such error?”

² Vasishta said:—

Because the knowledge of all things is contained in our consciousness, it is plain that this eternal and uncreated self is the cause and container of them all at all times.

³ That which has an insight or intuitive knowledge of all things, which are expressed by words and their meanings, is Brahma the soul and no other. Nothing that is meant by any significant term has a different form of its own. ⁴ As the quality of a bracelet is not different from its substance of gold, nor that of a wave from the water, so the expansion of the world is not distinct from the spirit of God.

¹⁰ The Spirit of God does not reside in creation. Creation does not exist in the Divine Spirit. There is no such relation of part and whole between God and creation.

¹⁸ The other ways in which God presents Himself to our intellects are that, He is holy, infinitely glorious, seen within us, and without beginning, middle or end. He has no rising or setting and exists of Himself without a substratum and as the substratum of all. ¹⁹ This knowledge of God is bliss itself, and His creation is identical with himself. Ignorance of God leads to knowledge of the objective world, and its extinction is the way to know the eternity of His existence.

²⁰ Brahma is conceived in our souls as He is represented to us by our consciousness, just like in our all comprehensive minds we know all other things according to our ideas of them. ²¹ Of these, only those things are true which we derive from our well-directed understanding. All those are untrue which the mind paints to us from the impressions of senses and the meanings of words that are incapable of expressing the nature of the indefinable and indescribable God.

²² Know the unreal world which appears as real, and the reality of God which appears as unreality, to be of the manner of air in motion and at rest. The visible world is like moving air that appears true to those who have no knowledge of the invisible God, who is as calm as the still air underlying the ethereal air and its motions.

²³ A thing may appear different from another, and yet be the same with it. The light in the fire is the same fire. So the visible world arising from invisible Brahma appears as another reality even though it is same as the reality of God. ²⁴ All things whether being or not being exist in God as their invisible and unknown source and cause. Just like clay in the earth is the cause of the would-be doll, the growing tree of a future carving, and the black powder of an ink not yet made. ²⁵ One thing is exhibited as another in the great desert of the Divine Mind that shows the phenomena of the world like figures in a mirage. ²⁶ The wise soul thinks this world as one with its source, Divine Consciousness. In the same way he considers a tree no way different from its parent seed.

³¹ There is nothing that rises or sets anywhere, or appears or disappears at anytime. Everything is unborn at all times and lies quiet in Divine Consciousness which is as solid as a massive rock. ³² It is imagination to explain things as formations of multitudes of combinations of atoms and to suppose every particle to be composed of minute infinitesimals because none of them could combine of themselves except by direction of the eternal mind. ³³ All force resides in some living principle, just as the waking, sleeping and dreaming states appertain to the individual soul, and as the undulation of waves exists in the water or the current of the stream that lies hidden in it.

³⁴ When the individual soul feels renunciation towards worldly enjoyments, scriptures say it has reached its highest perfection. ³⁵ As the mind is freed from its choice and dislike of things, so the soul is liberated by avoiding its egoism and personality. Then it no longer is conscious of the pain that attends future birth and reincarnation. ³⁶ Whoever in his understanding comes to know this state of supreme and inexpressible joy, he is sure to overcome all his worldly appetites that bind him fast to this earth. ³⁷ But whoever labors in his mind with affections to this world, he has to wander in it continually like in the whirlpool of a stream, and he destroys the supreme joy of his soul in his continuous turmoil.

Chapter 62 — Fate Is What Determines the Result of Action

These myriads of worlds and millennia of kalpa ages are no more real in themselves than our false computation of the millionth part of an atom or the twinkling of an eye. ² It is our error that represents them as true to us, though they are as false as our calculation of those infinitesimals.

⁷ Now tell me, what do you have to say with regard to material bodies as they exist on earth? What causes the body to be subject to the causes unknown to inner spirits?”

⁸ Vasishta replied:—

Divine Consciousness has an active, supernatural energy called the predominant Decree, Fate or Destiny which must come to pass and bear its command over all our actions and desires.

⁹ She is invested from the beginning with irresistible and multifarious powers. She destines the manner in which everything is to take place and continue forever. ¹⁰ She is the essential cause of all essence, and the chief mover of the intellect. She is called the great power of powers and remains as the great viewer of all things. ¹¹ She is called the great agency and the great producer of all events. She is known as the chief mover of occurrences, and she is the soul and source of all accidents. (chit shakti, power of consciousness; Mahasatta, Great Existence; Mahachiti, Great Intelligence; Mahashakti, Great Power; Mahadrishiti, Great Vision; Mahakriya, Great Doing; Mahodbhava, Great Becoming, and Mahaspanda, Great Vibration).

several parts in the great body of the cosmos.¹⁸ This foreknowledge of events imprinted in the Consciousness of God is called Destiny which extends over all things at all times.

¹⁹ Destiny comprises the knowledge of the causes that move, support and sustain all things in their proper order, and that such and such a cause must produce such and such effect forever. ²⁰ This destiny is the force or mobile power that moves all men, animals, plants and inanimate creations. It is the beginning or primary source of time and the motion of all beings. ²¹ It is combined with Divine Power, and this combination of them into one is the cause of the production and existence of the world.

²² It is the union or conformity of human effort with the course of destiny or decree of God that is productive of certain ends which are respectively called their destiny and destined effects.

²³ What more do you have to ask me, Rama, with regard to destiny and self-exertion when I tell you that it is destined that all beings take themselves to their proper actions, in the destined or prescribed manner, in order to bring about the desired result?

²⁸ Destiny is inactive and abortive, without an active power to enforce it to action. It is human activity that produces effect or production in nature by the help of destiny. ²⁹ Depend on destiny and remain both deaf and dumb as a doll. Be inactive and become dull and torpid as a block. Say, what is the good of this vital breath, unless it has its vitality and activity?

Chapter 63 — No Duality; Only the Appearance of Forms of the One Divine Mind

The essence of Brahma is all in all and ever remains in every manner in everything in all places. It is omnipotence, omniform and the lord God of all.² This essence is the Spirit or Soul whose omnipotence develops itself sometimes in the form of intellectual activity and sometimes in the tranquility of soul. Sometimes it shows itself in the movement of bodies, and at others in the force of the passions and emotions of the soul. Sometimes as something in the form of creation, and at another as nothing in the annihilation of the world.

³ Whenever it realizes itself anywhere in any form or state, it is then viewed in the same manner at the same place and time.⁴ The absolute omnipotence manifests itself as it likes and appears to us. All its powers are exhibited in one form or another to our view and understandings.

⁹ It is the Universal Soul that shows itself in some form or other to our deluded senses and understandings, and also according to our different apprehensions of the same thing.¹⁰ Only the ignorant understand the omniform God to be all forms of things. The learned know the forms to be modifications of the various powers of the Almighty, and not the figures themselves.

Chapter 64 — Uncaused Brahma Creates Rules of Causation for Forms

The Supreme Deity is the all-pervading spirit and the great God and Lord of all. He is without beginning or end and is identical with the infinite bliss of his translucent self-reflection. ² It is from this supreme joy and purely intellectual substance that the individual soul and mind have their rise before their production of the Universe.

³ Rama asked, “How could the self-reflection of Brahma, as the infinite spirit and one without a second, conceive in it a finite individual soul other than itself and which was not in being?”

The immense and transparent spirit of Brahma remained in a state of non-existence (asat), a state of ineffable bliss as seen by the adept yogi, but of formidable vastness as conceived by the uninitiated novice. ⁵ This state of supreme bliss, ever tranquil and full with the pure essence of God, is altogether indefinable and incomprehensible, even by the most proficient in divine knowledge.

⁸ Rama, know that the individual soul is an extension of Divine Spirit, like the swelling of the sea and the burning of a candle when its flame is unshaken by the wind. ⁹ The individual soul is possessed of a finite awareness as distinguished from the clear and calm consciousness of the Divine Spirit. Its vitality is the nature of the living God, but it is only a flash of the empty consciousness of Brahma.

¹⁰ Vitality is the essential property of the soul, resembling the inseparable properties of motion in wind, warmth in fire and coldness in ice. ¹¹ When we forget the nature of Divine Consciousness and Spirit, our self-consciousness leaves us with a knowledge of ourselves and this is called the individual soul. ¹² It is by means of this positive consciousness that we know our egoism or self-existence. It strikes us more glaringly than a spark of fire, and enlightens us to the knowledge of ourselves more than any other light.

¹³ When we look up to heaven we see a blue vault beyond which our eyes have no the power to pierce. In the same way, when we inquire into the nature of soul, we cannot see beyond consciousness of ourselves. ¹⁴ Our knowledge of the soul is presented to us in the form of an ego that is known by its thoughts, like the empty sky appearing as a blue sphere because of the clouds. ¹⁵ Ego differentiates the soul from our ideas of space and time and stirs within it like the breath of winds by reason of its subjectivity of thoughts. ¹⁶ The subject of thoughts is known as ego. It is also called various other names like the intellect, the soul, the mind, illusion (maya) and nature (prakriti).

develops itself like a seed in the form of the cosmic egg by its internal force.²⁰ The same fiery spark figuratively called the cosmic egg (brahmanda) became like a snowball in water and conceived the great Brahma within its hollow womb.

²³ Thus in the beginning of creation, the first born living being had a form for himself as he liked. Afterwards he created the world in his form of Brahma or Virinchi (“Creator”).²⁴ Whatever the self-born and self-willed soul wishes to produce, the same appears immediately to view as produced of its own accord.²⁵ Brahma, originating in Divine Consciousness, was by his nature the primary cause of all without any cause of his own. He appointed the acts of men to be the cause of their transition from one state to another in the course of the world.

³⁰ So people’s own personal acts are the causes of their repeated births and deaths in this or other worlds. They ascend higher or sink lower by virtue of good or bad deeds that proceed from their hearts and the nature of their souls.³¹ Our actions are the efforts of our minds and they shape our good or bad destinies according to their merit or demerit.

All fate and luck in the existing world are the fruits and flowers of past acts, even of those done in prior kalpa ages. This is called their destiny.

Chapter 65 — Nature of the Individual Soul as the Same as Universal Consciousness

At first Mind sprang from the supreme Cause of all. This mind is the active soul which resides in the Supreme Soul. ² The mind hangs in doubt between what is and what is not, and what is right and what is wrong. It forgets the past by its willful negligence like the scent of a fleeting odor. ³ Yet there is no difference between these seeming contraries. The dualities of Brahma and the soul, the mind and illusion (maya), the agent and act, and the world of phenomena and that of ideals, all blend together in the unity of God.

¹² As there is no difference between the soul, consciousness and life, so there is no duality in the individual soul and consciousness, or in the body and its acts which are inseparable from each other.

¹³ Acts are the causes of bodies and the body is not the mind. The mind is one with egoism, and the ego is the individual soul. The individual soul is one with Divine Consciousness and this soul is all and the lord God of all.

Chapter 66 — Individual Souls Mistake Subjective for Objective

¹² When the weak intellect is quiet by its union with the Supreme and by suppression of its functions, it is then called quiescent or indifferent (sansanta). ¹³ It is the weak intellect that thinks of external things, but sound understanding ceases all thoughts. It is a slight intoxication that makes one rave and revel about, while deep drinking is dead to all excitements. ¹⁴ When sound and consummate understanding runs in one course towards its main reservoir of the Supreme, it becomes divested of its knowledge of the external things and, in the presence of the one and no other, it also loses its self-consciousness. ¹⁵ Perfected understanding finds the errors to which it is exposed by its sensation of the external things and comes to know that birth and life and all acts and sights of the living state are as false as dreams.

¹⁸ It is not difficult to repress the action of the mind and rouse our consciousness in order to heal our souls of the malady of their mistaken notion of the world. ¹⁹ If you can succeed suppressing the desires of your restless mind at anytime, you are sure to obtain your liberation even instantly and without fail. ²⁰ If you will only turn to the side of your subjective consciousness, you will get rid of the objective world in the same manner as one is freed from his fear of snake in a rope by his examination of the thing. ²¹ If it is possible to get rid of the restless mind, which is the source of all our desires, then it is possible for anyone to attain the chief end of liberation.

Chapter 67 — Lecture on Creation: Still Consciousness & Moving Thoughts

¹ Rama said, “Leaving the mind, please tell me more about the nature of the individual soul. What relation does it have to the Supreme Soul? How did the individual soul spring from the Supreme Soul and what is its essence?”

² Vasishta replied:—

Know that Brahma is omnipresent and is the Lord of all at all times. He manifests himself in whatever attribute he assumes to himself of his free will. ³ The attribute which the Universal Soul assumes to itself in the form of perception (chetana) is known by the term “individual soul”, which possesses the power of volition in itself.

⁴ There are two causal principles combined with the individual soul, namely its predestination resulting from its prior acts and volitions and its later free will. These branch forth severally into the various causes of birth, death and existence of beings.

⁵ Rama said, “Such being the case, tell me, O greatest of sages, what does this predestination mean? What are these acts and how do they become the causal agents of subsequent events?”

Consciousness (chit) has its own nature or properties of vibration and rest, like the movement and stillness of wind in the air. Its agitation is the cause of its action. Otherwise it is calm and quiet as a dead block of stone. ⁷ Its vibration appears in the fluctuations of the mind and its calmness in the lack of mental activity and exertions, as in the detachment of the stillness of yoga meditation.

⁸ The vibrations of consciousness, which are the movements of thoughts, lead to its continual rebirths; its quietness settles it in the state of the immovable Brahma. The movement of thought is known to be the cause of the living state and all its actions. ⁹ This vibrating intellect is the thinking Soul, and it is known as the living agent of actions, the primary seed of the universe. ¹⁰ This secondary soul then assumes a luminous form according to the light of its thoughts, and afterwards becomes many and diverse at its will and through the pulsations of the primary consciousness all over the creation. ¹¹ The pulsating intellect or soul, having passed through many transformations, is at last freed from its motion and migration. Some souls pass through a thousand births and forms while others obtain their liberation in a single birth. ¹² The human soul, being a pulsating intellect, is of its own nature prone to assume dualism. So it becomes its own cause of its reincarnations and sufferings, as also of its transient bliss or misery in heaven or hell.

¹³ As the same gold is changed into the forms of bracelets and other things, and as the same gross matter appears in the different forms of wood and stone, so the uniform soul of God appears as multiform according to his various modes and attributes. ¹⁴ An error of the human mind makes it view the forms as realities. It is a fallacy that causes one to think his soul, which is free from birth and form, is born, lives and dies, just like a man sees a city rise and fall in his delirium.

¹⁶ As Lavana, the King of Mathura, falsely thought he was an outcaste tribal, so consciousness thinks on its own different states of existence and that of the world. ¹⁷ All this world is the phantom of an false imagination, O Rama! It is no more than the swelling of the waters of the deep. ¹⁸ Consciousness is always busy exercising the intellect of its own intelligences and the innate principles of its action. It is like the sea seen swelling with its waters moving of themselves in waves. ¹⁹ The intellect is like the water in the wide expanse of Brahma. Its movement raises the waving thoughts in the mind, resembling the bubbles of water, and produces the revolutions of individual souls like eddies in the sea of this world. ²⁰ Know your soul, O gentle Rama, to be a phenomenon of the all pervading Brahma who is both the subject and object of his consciousness, and who has placed a particle of himself in you, like the breath of a mighty lion.

²¹ The intellect with its consciousness constitutes the individual soul, and the soul with the will forms the mind. Its knowing power is understanding and its retentiveness is called its memory. Its subjectivity of selfishness is called egoism, and its error is called illusion (maya).

²⁸ And yet God is said to be the cause and substratum of all these unobstructed phantoms rising to view, just as empty air is said to be the receptacle for rising trees. Thus the non-causing God is said to be the cause of this uncaused world which only exists in our illusive conceptions and presents itself to our delusive sensations of it. ²⁹ As a polished piece of iron reflects a grosser piece, so do our finer or inner sensations take the representations of the gross forms of their particular objects.

³⁰ These sensations are conveyed to the mind, then to the individual soul and intellect in the same manner as the roots supply sap to the stem, then to the branches, and lastly to the fruits of trees. ³¹ As a seed produces fruit and the fruit contains the seed in itself, so the intellect producing the mind and its thoughts can not get rid of them, but is contained in and is reproduced by them in successive reincarnations.

³² There is some difference between the comparison of the unconscious seed and tree with the conscious intellect and mind, but the thoughts of the creator and creation, like the seed and tree, reproduce one another without end. ³³ There is this difference between the unconscious seed and conscious intellect: the former continually reproduces itself, while the latter ceases its process upon attainment of liberation. Yet the ideas of creator and creation reproduce each other without end.

⁴⁰ “Now tell me sage, how do the spiritual particles increase in bulk? How was the body of the self-born Brahma produced from Brahman? Tell me also how these objects in nature come into existence in their material forms?”

⁴¹ Vasishtha replied:—

This form which sprang of itself from its own essence is too incredible and is without parallel. It is altogether inconceivable how something is produced of its own conception.

⁴⁸ Next this god finds in his understanding knowledge of the word “taste” and gets the notion of it becoming the object of a particular organ of sense, to be hereafter called “the tongue.” ⁴⁹ The individual soul then finds out in his mind the meaning of the word “light,” which was afterwards to sparkle in the eye, the particular organ of sight. ⁵⁰ Next the god comes to know in his mind the property of smell and the organ of smelling, and also the substance of earth to which it appertains as its inseparable property. ⁵¹ In this manner the individual soul becomes acquainted with the other sensations and the organs to which they appertain as their inseparable properties and objects.

⁵² The unsubstantial living spirit which derives its being from the essence of the substantial Brahma, comes next to acquire the knowledge of sound, the object of the organ of hearing, and the property of air. ^{53a} It then comes to understand the meaning of the word touch as the medium of feeling, and also to know the tongue as the only organ of taste. ^{53b} It finds the property of color to be the peculiar object of the eye, the organ of sight, and that smell is an object peculiar to the nose, the organ of the sense of smelling. ⁵⁴ The individual soul is thus the common receptacle of the sensations, and source of the senses, which it develops afterwards in the organs of sense in the body. It perceives the sensation of sensible objects through the perceptive holes that convey their perceptions into the sensorium of the mind.

⁵⁵ Such, O Rama, is how it was with the first animated being. It remains like this with all living animals. All sensations are represented in the Soul of the world in its spiritual form (ativahika) called the subtle body or astral body (sukshma or lingadeha). ⁵⁶ The nature of this abstruse essence is as undefinable as that of the spirit. It appears to be in motion when it really is at rest, as in our idea of the soul. ⁵⁷ As measure and dimensions are foreign to our notion of Brahma, the all-conscious Soul, so they are quite foreign to spirit also, which is no more than the motive power of the soul. ⁵⁸ As the notion of the spiritual is distinct from material and corporeal, so the notion of Brahma is quite apart from everything, except that of his self-consciousness.

⁵⁹ Rama said, “If consciousness is identical with Brahma, and our consciousness of ourselves as Brahma, make us identical with Brahma Himself, then what is the use of devising a duality of the soul, or of talking of the liberation and final absorption of the one in the other?”

⁶⁰ Vasishta replied:—

Rama, your question is irrelevant at this time when I was going to prove another thing. Nothing can be appropriate out of its proper time and place, as the untimely offering of flowers is not acceptable to the gods. ⁶¹ A word full of meaning becomes meaningless out of its proper place, just like the offering of flowers to gods and guests out of their proper time. ⁶² There is a time to introduce a subject and another to hold silence over it. Everything becomes fruitful in its proper season. ⁶³ But to resume our subject.

The individual soul afterwards appears from Him like the human soul appears in dreaming, and the individual soul thought in himself that he was the great father of created beings in time to come. ⁶⁴ He uttered the syllable Om and was conscious of its meaning in his mind, which soon displayed all forms of beings to his mental vision. ⁶⁵ All these were unrealities displayed in the empty sphere of the Divine Mind. The shadowy world seemed like a huge mountain floating in the air before him.

⁶⁶ It was neither born of itself nor was it made by Brahma. It is not destroyed at anytime by any other power. It was Brahma himself, appearing like the phantom of city in the sky. ⁶⁷ As the living Brahma and other spiritual beings are unreal in their nature, so also the essences of other beings, from the big giant to the little ant, are only mere unrealities in their substance. ⁶⁸ It is our false understanding that represents these unrealities as real ones to us. Clear understanding will find all things, from the great Brahma down to the minutest insect, to vanish entirely from its sight.

⁶⁹ The same cause that produces Brahma also produces insects. It is the greater depravity of the mind that causes its rebirth in the contemptible forms of worms. ⁷⁰ The living being possessed of a rational soul and devoted to the cultivation of the mind attains to the state of man. He then acts righteously for attaining a better state in after life.

⁷⁴ The knower perceives everything in his mind as revealed by Brahma. The knower meets with everything as allotted by God for his share. ⁷⁵ It is the immutable law of nature that nothing can be otherwise than what it is ordained to be. There is nothing in nature that can change its nature for a minute in a whole kalpa age. ⁷⁶ And yet this creation is a false phantom, and so is the growth and dissolution of all created beings, as is also our enjoyment of them.

⁷⁷ Brahma is pure, all pervading, infinite and absolute. It is only for our misery that we take him for impure matter and unreal substance, and as definite and limited pluralities. ⁷⁸ It is the spoiled imagination of children that fancies water and its waves to be different things and makes a false distinction between those which really are the same thing. ⁷⁹ It is His undivided self that expands itself in visible nature, and which appears like a duality, like waves and the sea, and bracelets and gold. Thus He of himself appears as other than himself.

⁸⁰ We are led to imagine the visible and changing world as having sprung from the invisible and immutable spirit which manifests itself in the form of the mind that produced the ego. Thus we have the visible from the invisible, and the mind and the ego from the same source. ⁸¹ Mind joined with ego produces notions of elementary principles or elemental particles that the individual soul, combined with its intellect, derives from the main source of Brahma, and of which it formed the phenomenal world.

Chapter 68 — Story of the Demoness Karkati, Vishuchika (Cholera) & Suchi (Needle); Her Tapas

Hear me relate to you, Rama, an old story bearing upon this subject and relating to a difficult question that was resolved by a rakshasi (female demon).

² There lived on the north of Himalaya a heinous rakshasi named Karkati, a crooked crab, who was as dark as ink and as stalwart as a rock, with limbs strong enough to split the sturdy oak. ³ She was also known as Vishuchika or Choleric Pain, by which she was ever afflicted, and which had reduced her frame like that of Vindhya Hill which was pushed down (by the curse of Agastya). ⁴ Her eyeballs were blazing like fires. Her stature reaching half way to the sky. She was covered by a blue garment, like the shade of night wrapping the atmosphere. ⁵ A white cloak covered her head like a cloud fragment. The long erect hairs of her head stood like a dark cloud on her crest. ⁶ Her eyes flashed like lightning, and her sharp hooked nails glistened like sapphires. Her legs were as long as tamara trees, and her loud laughter was like a burst of frost. ⁷ A string of dried bones decorated her body like a wreath of flowers. Traces of dead bodies adorned every part of her body. ⁸ She frolicked in the company of vetala ghosts, with human skulls hanging down her ears like earrings. When she stretched out her arms she looked like she was going to pluck the sun from his sphere.

Chapter 69 — Brahma Declares Karkati's Tapas Complete, Grants Her Boon to Be a Pin to Cause Pain

After the passing of a thousand years, Brahma appeared to Karkati in order to put an end to the intensity of her austerities and crown her with success and the reward of her tapas. ² She saluted him internally in her mind and remained fixed in her position thinking about the boon she should beg of him for allaying her keen appetite. ³ She soon recollected a certain request, which she should present to her complying god. It was to transform her soft and flexible form to the shape of an inflexible iron needle with which she could torment all living beings.

⁴ At Brahma's bidding, she thought in herself, "I will become as thin as a minute pin in order to enter imperceptibly into the hearts of animals, like the fragrance of flowers enters the nostrils. ⁵ By this means will I suck blood from the heart of beings to my heart's satisfaction. In this way my hunger will be satisfied and my appetite gratified to the greatest delight of my soul."

⁶ As she was thinking in this manner, the god discovered her sinister motives, contrary to the character of a yogi, and approached her with a voice resembling the roaring of clouds.

⁸ Karkati answered, "O Lord of the past and future! If you are inclined to grant my request, then please confer on me the boon of transforming my un-iron-like body to the form of an iron needle."

⁹ Vasishta said:—

The god pronounced "Be it so," and added, "You will be like a pin (Suchi) and you shall be called choleric pain (Vishuchika) because you give pain to all bodies. ¹⁰ You shall be the cruel cause of acute pain to all living beings, particularly to the intemperate and hard-working fools and loose libertines who are destined to be your devoted victims. ¹¹ Moreover shall you molest the dwellers of unhealthy districts, and the practitioners of malpractices by entering their hearts with your infectious breath, and by disturbing their sleep and deranging the liver and other intestinal parts of the body.

"Let these lines be tied as an amulet on the left arm. ¹⁵ Then rub the painful part with the palm of that hand, and think the colic Karkati to be crushed under the mallet of this amulet and driven back beyond the hills with loud wailing. ¹⁶Let the patient think the medicinal moon is seated in his heart and believe himself to be freed from death and disease, and his faith will save his life and heal his pain.

¹⁷When the attentive adept, who having purified himself with sprinkling water in his mouth, repeats this formula, he succeeds in a short time to remove the colic pain altogether.”

¹⁸Then, after delivering this effective amulet to the spiritual masters (siddhas) attending upon him, the lord of the three worlds disappeared in the air. He went to his splendid seat in heaven where he was received by God Indra who advanced to hail him with his praises.

Now this Karkati who had been as tall as a mountain-peak, and a rakshasi of the blackest kind, resembling a thick and dark cloud of the rainy season, gradually began to fade away and grow leaner and leaner day by day. ² Her gigantic cloud-like form was soon reduced to the shape of a tree branch which afterwards became like the figure of a man, and then the measure of only a cubit. ³ It next became the length of a span in its height, and then of a finger's length in all. Growing by degrees thinner and thinner like grain, it became at last as lean as a needle or a pin. ⁴ Thus she was reduced to the thinness of a needle, fit only to sew a silken robe. By her own desire that could change a hill to a grain of sand, she had become as lean as the filament of the lotus flower.

²⁰ How be it, having renounced her gigantic form, the rakshasi soon learnt to be content with her needle form, although she viewed her transformation as worse than her dissolution itself.²¹ But see the contradictory desires of the infatuated who distaste in a trice what at one time they fondly wished. This fiend was disgusted at her needle form instead of her monstrous figure.²² As one dish of food is easily replaced by another, suiting the taste of the gourmand, so this fiend did not hesitate to shun her gigantic body, which she took to taste the heart blood of animals in her pin form.²³ Even death is delightful to the giddy headed when they are over fond of something else. The minimum of a meager needle was desirable to the monstrous fiend to gratify her fiendish desire.

²⁴ Now this needle took the rarefied form of air and moved about after all living beings as the colic wind in quest of sucking animal gore.²⁵ Its body was like fiery heat and its life the vital breath of animals. Its seat was in the sensitive heart, and it was as swift as the particles of solar and lunar beams.²⁶ It was as destructive as the blade of a deadly sword, and as fleet as vapors flying in air. It penetrated bodies in the minute form of odor.²⁷ It was ever bent to do evil, like an evil spirit, as she was now known by that name. Her sole object was to kill the lives of others at her pleasure.

²⁸ Her body divided into two halves; one was as fine as a silken thread and the other as soft as a thread of cotton.²⁹ Suchi ranged all about the ten sides of the world in her two forms and pierced and penetrated into the hearts of living beings with all her excruciating pains.³⁰ Karkati gave up her former big body, and took the form of the acute and small needle in order to accomplish all these purposes of hers, whether they be great or little.³¹ To men of little understanding, a slight business becomes an arduous task. The foolish fiend had recourse to her austerities in order to do the mean work of a needle.³² Again, however good and great, men can hardly get rid of their natural disposition. The great rakshasi performed her austere tapas in order to become a vile pin for molesting mankind.

withered trees, and spots infested by crows, flies and peacocks; also in places of dry, humid and high winds and in benumbed fingers and toes. ⁴³ She is in cloudy regions, in cavernous districts of the form of rotten bodies, in regions of melting and driving snows, and in marshy grounds abounding in anthills and hills of malura trees. ⁴⁴ She exhibits herself in the mirage of desert sand and in wildernesses abounding with ravenous beasts and snakes. Sometimes she is seen in lands infested by venomous reptiles, disgusting leeches and worms. ⁴⁵ She frequents stagnant pools soiled by dry leaves and those chewed by pisacha ghosts. She haunts hovels beside road crossings where passengers halt and take shelter from cold. ⁴⁶ She rambles in all places, everywhere leeches suck the blood of men, and vile people tear them with their nails and hold them in their fists to feed upon them. ⁴⁷ In this manner she is everywhere in the landscape of cities, until she is tired with her long journey through them.

sewing.⁶⁴ The acute and unfeeling colic, being as ignorant of the softness or dryness of the object as the stiff and heartless needle, pierces the hardest breast without deriving any sweetness from it.

deem himself blessed to be in the company of his equals? ⁶⁸ The herd of common people is ever fond of mixing with the ignorant rabble because there is nobody who can avoid the company of his equals.

⁷⁹ "How great is my master-stroke," says the needle, "that I have come from stitching the shreds of cloth to piercing the hearts of men. So be it and I am happy at my success." ⁸⁰ As the rust of the lazy needle passes off in sewing, without being rubbed with dust, so must it rust unless it is put into the action of piercing patient and passive shreds. ⁸¹ The unseen and airy darts of fate are as fatal as the acts of cruel advanced cholera, though both have their respite of their massacres at short intervals. ⁸² The needle is at rest after its act of sewing is done; but the wicked are not satisfied even after their acts of slaughter are over.

⁸³ It dives in the dirt and rises in the air. It flies with the wind and lies down wherever it falls. It sleeps in the dust and hides itself at home and in the inside, and under the cloths and leaves. It dwells in the hand and ear-holes, in lotuses and heaps of woolen stuffs. It is lost in the holes of houses, in clefts of wood and underneath the ground.

⁸⁴ Valmiki added:—

As the sage was speaking in this manner, the sun went down in the west, and the day departed to its evening service. The assembly broke after mutual salutations, to perform their sacred ablution, and joined again on the next morning, with the rising beams of the sun to the royal palace.

After the carnivorous fiend Karkati had feasted for a long period on the flesh and blood of human kind, she found her insatiable appetite to know no bounds. She was never satisfied with anything.

² She used to be satisfied with a drop of blood in her form of the needle. Now she became sorry at the loss of the insatiable thirst and appetite of her former state.

³ She thought in herself, “O pity it is that I came to be a vile needle. With so weak and slender a body, I can take nothing for my food. ⁴ How foolish I have been to forego my former gigantic form and change my dark cloudy figure for something like the dry leaf of a forest tree. ⁵ O wretch that I am to have foregone my dainty food of flesh flavored with fat. ⁶ I am doomed to dive in dirt and drop down on the ground to be trodden and trampled under the feet of people, soiled and sullied in filth. ⁷ O me miserable, helpless and hopeless thing, and without any support or status. From one sorrow I fall to another, and one danger is succeeded by another! ⁸ I have no mistress or maidservant, no father or mother. I have no son or brother, nor anyone to serve or befriend me. ⁹ I have nobody, no home, and no refuge or asylum anywhere. I have no fixed dwelling anywhere. Instead I am driven about like falling leaves by driving winds. ¹⁰ I am subject to all accidents and exposed to every kind of calamity. I wish for my extinction, but it wishes not to approach me.”

¹¹ “What have I done? In the foolishness of my heart, I have given away my own big body, like a madman gives away a precious jewel for a paltry piece of glass. ¹² One calamity is enough to turn the brain out of order, but what will be my case when it is followed by other disasters in endless succession? ¹³ I am hung up to be suffocated by smoke and dropped down in the streets to be trodden underfoot. I am cast away with dirt and hidden under grass to my great distress. ¹⁴ I serve at another's will, and am guided by my guide. I am stark naked while I sew for others, and I am ever a dependent on another's guidance. ¹⁵ Long do I work and walk for a small worthless gain, and stitching alone is all the work that I have to perform for life. O unlucky that I am, that even my bad luck is so very unlucky.”

¹⁶ “With my remorse today, I see the demon of despair rising before me and threatening to make an end of this body of which I have made an offering to him. ¹⁷ After my foolishness losing so big and bulky a body, what better fate can await me than to be annihilated into nothing, rather than be a thing which is good for nothing? ¹⁸ What man will pick me up, who is as lean as a thread worm, from the heap of ashes under which I lie buried by the wayside? ¹⁹ No keen sighted man will take such a wretched and forlorn being into his consideration, just like nobody living on a high hill ever stoops to take notice of the grass growing on the ground below. ²⁰ I cannot expect to raise myself higher while I am lying in a sea of ignorance. What blind man guided by the flash of fireflies can perceive the glorious sunlight? ²¹ I find myself drowned in a sea of misery and I know not how long I shall have to labor under my difficulties.”

²² “When shall I be restored to the form of the daughter of Anjanagiri Mountain and stand like a pillar over the ruins of the nether and upper worlds? ²³ When shall I have my arms reach the clouds and my eyes flashing like lightning, my clothes as white as snow and my hair touching the sky? ²⁴ When will my big belly resemble a huge cloud and my long breasts hang below like pillows shaking with the motion of my body, dancing like the wings of a peacock? ²⁵ When will the ash-white light emitted by my laughter cast shade onto the sun, and my former high stature threaten to devour the terrible god of death? ²⁶ Some time ago my hollow sockets, deep as the holes of mortars, flashed with living fire like the rays of the sun, and my large legs moved in my rambling like two monumental pillars. ²⁷ When shall I have my big belly with its huge pot-belly? When shall I again have my soft black nails that resemble the dark and humid clouds of autumn. ²⁸ When will those tender smiles return to me with which I moved the great rakshasa demons to my favor? When shall I dance in my giddy circles at the music of the tabor in the forests? ²⁹ When will that big belly of mine be filled with pots full of fattened liquor and be fed with heaps of flesh and bones from dead bodies? ³⁰ When shall I get drunk drinking the blood of human gore and become merry and giddy until I fall fast asleep?”

³⁴ “O great Vindhya Mountains with your hollow and snow covered caves! Why do you not destroy your dull elephants with your native lions? It is I who is as silly as an elephant. ³⁵ O my arms that used to break down mountain peaks, why do you fail to pluck the butter-like moon with your moony nails? ³⁶ O my breast that was as fair as snowy mountain sides, even without my glassy ornaments. Why do you not show your hairs, which were as large as leeches that feed on lion’s flesh? ³⁷ O my eyes that used to dispel the darkness of the darkest night and kindle dry fuel with your glaring fire. Why do you cease to lighten the air with your brightness? ³⁸ O my shoulder blades! Are you broken down and leveled with the earth, or are you crushed and smashed or moldered and worn out by age? ³⁹ O my moon-bright face! Why do you not shine over me with your bright beams that resemble the everlasting light of the orb of the moon? Are you now at an end forever? ⁴⁰ O my hands! Where is your strength fled today? Do you not see how I am transformed into an ignoble needle that is moved by the touch of the foot of a fly? ⁴¹ Alas! The cavity of my navel was as deep as a well and beset by hair resembling rows of beautiful plants about it. My protuberant posteriors were like the bottom of the Vindya hills. ⁴² Where is that towering stature reaching to the sky, and what is this new earned contemptible form of the needle? Where is that mouth, hollow as the vault of the sky, and what is this hole of the needle? Where is my heap of flesh meat and what is this drop of watery food?”

“Ah, how lean have I grown. But who is to be blamed for an act of my own doing?”

Chapter 72 — Suchi Again Performs Tapas

Afterwards Suchi became silent and motionless and thought of resuming her austerities for the sake of regaining her long lost body. ² With this intention she returned to the Himalayas where, abstaining from her desire of human gore, she sat repeating her criticisms and rebukes. ³ In her mind she saw her needle form entering into her heart with her breathing. ⁴ Meditating on her mental form of the needle, she was blown upwards by her vital breath to the top of the hill and alighted on it like a vulture from high. ⁵ There she remained alone and apart from all living beings, sitting amidst burning fire with her form of an ash-colored stone. ⁶ She sat there like a sprout of grass springing in that dry and grassless spot. But soon she faded away into a blade of withered hay in the sandy desert. ⁷ She remained standing on the toe of one foot, and she continued criticizing and rebuking her own self. ⁸ In her tiptoe position, she lightly touched the ground and avoiding all sidelong looks. She gazed on the upper sky with her face upraised and her eyes uplifted. ⁹ The fine point of the black iron needle penetrated the ground and firmly preserved its standing posture. It fed itself upon the air which it inhaled by its uplifted mouth. ¹⁰ The scarcity of food in the forest made her look like she was in search of some prey coming from a distance. Her shadow shaking with the wind enticed the unwary to approach towards it.

dead drunk, never move from their place. ²⁴ A holy hermit who is devoted to his purpose in time loses the motion of his external organs, but by the exercise of his reason, he obtains the light of true knowledge in his soul.

²⁵ Thus did Suchi gain the light of knowledge and become a seer of the past and future. She became cleansed of the impurity of her sins, and her impurity (visuchi) turned to purity (suchi). ²⁶ She came to know the truly knowable in her own understanding. After the removal of her sins by tapas, she felt true bliss in her soul. ²⁷ She continued in her austere tapas for many thousands of years, to the great astonishment of seven times seven worlds that became frightened at her austerities. ²⁸ The fervor of her tapas set great mountains on fire, and that flame spread to all the worlds like the blaze of an auspicious meteor.

²⁹ This made Indra, the god of heaven, ask Narada about the cause of this intense tapas, saying, “Who is so immersed in tapas that she obtains the fruit of worlds by her austere tapas?”

Narada replied, ³⁰ “It is Suchi, who by her continued tapas of thousands of years, has attained her highest state of enlightenment. She is that light which now enflames all the worlds. ³¹ It is Suchi’s tapas, O lord of gods, that makes naaga serpents sigh and hills tremble. It causes the celestials to fall down and the sea to overflow on earth. It dries up all things and casts a shade over bright orb of the sun itself.”

Chapter 73 — Narada Explains Suchi's Tapas to Indra Who Sends Maruta to Disturb Her Tapas

Indra, having learned about Karkati's austere tapas, was curious to know more about her from Narada. ² Indra asked, "I know Suchi acquired her fiendish practice of blood sucking by means of her tapas, but who is this apish Karkati that is so greedy to gain flesh and bones?"

³ Narada replied:—

It is Karkati, the malevolent fiend, who became the individual soul Suchi, the colic pain of the living, and assumed the shape of an iron needle as its support. ⁴ Afterwards, having forsaken that prop, it entered the human body, then it flew up to the heart on the vehicle of vital breath, and is seated in the car of the current air in atmosphere. ⁵ This colic of life Suchi, having entered into the bodies of vicious lives, passes through the canals of their entrails and the pores of their flesh, fat and blood, then nestles in the interior part like a bird. ⁶ It enters the intestines with the breath of air and settles there in the form of flatulent colic. Afterwards, seated at the end of the nyagrodha artery, it becomes the various forms of colic with fullness of blood and inflammation. ⁷ It also enters the body through other parts and organs and receives different names according to its situation. Then it feeds upon their flesh and marrow. ⁸ Fastened to the knots of flower wreaths and stuck to leafy garlands decorating the breasts and cheeks of fond maidens, she sleeps enraptured with them on the bosoms of their loving spouses.

¹⁸ Now this living Suchi, intending to become a devotee, remains as motionless as an immovable substance and as fixed and steady in her mind. ¹⁹ The iron-hearted needle, being now rarefied like invisible air, is traversing to all sides on the swift wings of winds resembling its riding horses. ²⁰ It goes on feeding on the flesh and drinking the blood of all living beings, and carrying on its various acts of giving and receiving, and dancing and singing all along.²¹ Though the incorporeal Suchi has become aeriform and invisible as vacuum, yet there is nothing which she is unable to accomplish by the powers of her mind, outstripping the swiftness of the winds.²² But though she runs mad with her meat and turns giddy with her drink, yet she is curbed by fate from running at random, like an elephant in chains.

³² When the container is in existence, it is possible to fill it with its contents and not otherwise. So one having his body can seek and get every pleasurable object to give it delight.³³ Remembering now the past enjoyments of her former body, she became sad in her mind that before she had been so highly pleased and satisfied filling its belly.³⁴ Then she resolved to undertake austere tapas for the purpose of recovering her former body. With this object in view, she chose for herself the proper situation for her castigations.

garuda. ⁴⁰ There standing on one leg, supported on an atom of dust, she remained like the mountain peacock that stands on one leg with its head raised to the sky.

⁴⁷ From then, O Indra, she has undertaken her protracted tapas and she has passed many years in the solitary wilderness in her steady position and posture of body. ⁴⁸ It now behooves you, O Indra who is skilled in stratagems, to devise some plan to delude her from her object, or else her tapas will destroy the people you have so long preserved.

⁴⁹ Vasishta said:—

Indra, having heard these words of Narada, sent Maruta, the god of winds, to search for Suchi in all quarters of the globe.

⁵⁰ Then God Maruta, in his spiritual form of intelligence, proceeded in quest of her. Having traversed the ethereal regions, he alighted upon the nether world. The winds and all other elemental and physical powers are also believed to be endued with intelligence. They are not mere brute forces. They could never regularly discharge their proper functions without intelligence.

⁶⁰ Thus the intelligence of air (Marut), having alighted on earth upon the wings of winds, rapidly spread himself to its utmost ends. ⁶¹ The god of air then directed his course to Jambudwipa (Asia). Having arrived there, he made his way to the summit of the snowy mountain, the Himalayas where Suchi was performing her tapas. ⁶² On the highest top of the summit, he saw a great desert as extensive as the expanse of the sky and devoid both of living creatures and the vestiges of animal bodies. ⁶³ It was unproductive of greens or grass owing to its nearness to the sun, and it was covered with dust like that which makes this earth. ⁶⁴ There, like the lucid waters of a river, spread a wide ocean of mirage to excite the thirst and allure the longings of men by its various colors that resemble the variegated colors of a rainbow. ⁶⁵ Its wide expanse, reaching almost to infinity, was not measurable even by the regents of the quarters of heaven, and the gusts of wind blowing upon it served to cover it with a canopy of dust. ⁶⁶ It resembled a wanton woman smeared with red powder like sunbeams and sandalwood paste like the moonbeams, and attentive to the whistling of the breeze. ⁶⁷ The god of the winds having travelled all over the seven continents and their seas, and being tired with his long journey on the surface of the earth, rested his gigantic body, which fills the infinite space in all directions, on the top of that mountain; like a butterfly resting on the twig of a tree after its wearied flight in the air.

¹ The god of the winds saw Suchi standing erect, like a crest on the summit of the mountain, amidst that vast tract of desert all around. ² She stood upon one leg fixed in her meditation and roasted by the burning sun over her head. She was dried up to a skeleton by her continued fasting, and her belly was contracted to shrunken skin. ³ Now and then she inhaled the hot air with her open mouth, then breathed it out as her heart could not contain the repeated influx of air. ⁴ She was withered under the scorching sunbeams, and battered in her frame by the hotter winds of the desert, yet she moved not from her stand-point as she was relieved every night by the cold bath of moonbeams. ⁵ She was content covering her head under particles of dust and did not like to change her state for a better fortune. ⁶ She gave up the possession of her forest to other living beings, and lived apart from all in the form of a crest of hair. Her breathings being withdrawn to the cranium, appeared out of it like a tuft of hairs or bushes clapped on her head.

⁷ The god of air was astonished to see Suchi in this state. He bowed down to her and was struck with terror as he saw her more carefully. ⁸ He was so overawed by the blaze of her body that he dared not ask her anything, such as, “O saintly Suchi, why do you undertake these austerities?” ⁹ He only exclaimed, “O holy Suchi, how wonderful is the sight of your tapas!” Impressed with veneration for her holiness, the god made his departure to heaven from where he had come.

¹⁰ He passed the region of the clouds and reached the sphere of the still air (sthira vayu). Then leaving the realm of the spiritual masters behind him, he arrived at the ecliptic path of the sun. ¹¹ Then rising higher in his airy car, he arrived at the city of Indra where he was cordially embraced by the lord of gods for the merit of his sight of Suchi. ¹² Being asked what he saw, he related all that he had seen to the assembled gods in the court of Indra.

¹⁵ “What more shall I relate other than that she has abstained even from air, and has made a mess of her entrails coiled up together? ¹⁶ She has contracted the opening of her mouth into a needle hole, and stopped even that with a particle of dust in order to restrain it from receiving even a cold dewdrop for food. ¹⁷ The fervor of her tapas has made the snowy mountain forsake its coldness and assume an igneous form which is difficult to approach. ¹⁸ Therefore let all of us rise and go to the great father of creatures for redress, or know that the result of her fervent tapas must prove to our disadvantage.”

her open eyes on the sun and by counting days by the rays of solar light penetrating the opening of her mouth, the needle hole. ²³ Suchi, though flexible as a bit of thread, had attained the firmness of Mount Meru by her erect posture. ²⁴ She saw, by the ray of sunlight that penetrated the eye of the needle, that her shadow was the only witness to her upright tapas. ²⁵ Suchi's shadow, the only attendant on her tapas, hid herself under her feet for fear of the midday heat. So do people find their best friends forsake their company in times of adversity.

After a thousand years of long and painful tapas by Suchi, Brahma, the great father of creation, appeared to her under his pavilion of the sky and bade her accept the boon she preferred. ² Suchi was absorbed in her tapas. Her vital principle of life, remaining dormant in her, wanted the external organs of sense to give utterance to her prayer. She remained only to think upon the choice she should make.

³ She thought to herself, “I am now a perfect being and I am delivered from my questions. Therefore, what blessing do I need to ask beyond this state of beatitude, bliss of contentment, and self-resignation which I already possess in my peace and tranquility? ⁴ I have the knowledge of all that is to be known. I am free from the web of errors. My rationality is developed. What more is necessary for a perfect and rational being? ⁵ Let me remain seated as I am in my present state. I am in the light of truth and quite removed from the darkness of untruth. What else is there for me to ask or accept?

“There can be no objection to your slaughter of animal life under proper bounds. ¹⁸ Therefore act within the bounds of justice and refrain from all acts of injustice in the world. Stick steadfastly to reason if you should like to live liberated in this life.”

¹⁹ Saying so far, the god disappeared from below to his heavenly sphere, when Suchi said to him, “Be it so. I have no objection to this.” Then, as she thought in her mind that she had no cause to be dissatisfied with the decree of the lotus-born Brahma, she found herself immediately in possession of her former body.

²⁰ She came to be of the measure of a span at first, then of a cubit, and next a full fathom in length. She was quickly increasing in height. She grew up like a tree until she was in the form of a cloud. She had all the members of the body added to her instantly, in the manner of the growth of the tree of human desire. ²¹ From the fibrous form of Suchi, the needle which was without form or feature, body, blood, bones, flesh or strength, there grew up all the parts and limbs at once. Just so the fancied garden of our desire suddenly springs up with all its green foliage and fruits and flowers from their hidden state.

Chapter 76 — Refraining from Unlawful Food

Suchi the needle now became the demoness Karkati again. Her leanness turned to bulkiness in the manner of a flimsy cloud assuming a gigantic form in the rainy season. ² Now returning to her native air and element, she felt some joy in herself. But she renounced her fiendish nature by the knowledge she had gained, like a snake throws off its old skin. ³ There seated in her lotus posture, she continued to reflect on her future course. Relying on the purity of her new life and faith, she remained fixed as a mountain peak.

⁶ She became sad not knowing what food she should take, because she thought the killing of animal life for food was unlawful and repugnant to her nature. ⁷ Food forbidden by the respectable and obtained by unjust means must be rejected even at the expense of one's valuable life. ⁸ "If my body," she thought, "should perish for lack of lawful food, I will not transgress the law for that. The guilt lies in sustaining my own life by taking unlawful food. ⁹ Whatever is not obtained according to the customary rules of society is not worth taking. If I should die without proper food, or live upon improper fare, it amounts to the same thing whether I live or die. ¹⁰ I was only the mind before, to which the body is added as a base appendage. It vanishes upon the knowledge of self. Hence its care and neglect are both alike."

¹¹ Vasishta resumed:—

As she was uttering these words in silence to herself, she heard a voice in the air coming from the god of winds who was pleased at the renunciation of her fiendish disposition. ¹² "Arise Karkati", the voice said, "and go to the ignorant and enlighten them with the knowledge you have gained. For it is the nature of the good and great to deliver the ignorant from their error. ¹³ Whoever does not receive this knowledge of lawful food from you, make him truly the object of your derision, and take him as being a right meat and proper food for you."

¹⁴ On hearing these words she responded, "I am much favored by you, kind god!" So saying, she got up and descended slowly from the height of the craggy mountain. ¹⁵ Having passed the heights, she came to the valley at the foot of the mountain. From there she proceeded to the homes of the Kirata people who inhabit the lands at the bottom of the hills. ¹⁶ She saw those places abounding in provisions of all sorts, such as humans and their cattle with their fodder and grass. There were vegetable as well as animal foods, with various kinds of roots and plants. There were eatables and drinkables also, with the flesh of deer and fowls, and even of reptiles and insects.

Chapter 77 — Karkati Travels to the Land of the Kiratas, Sees a King & His Minister, Debates Food

A deep dark night, black as ink and as thick as tangible pitch, covered the homes of the Kiratas. ² The sky was moonless and overcast by a veil of dark clouds. The woodlands were hidden by tamara trees and thick masses of black clouds flew about in the air. ³ Thick shrubs and bushes covered the hilly villages, obstructing passage by their impervious darkness. The flitting light of fireflies gave the homesteads an appearance of a bridal night. ⁴ The thick darkness spread over the compounds of houses shut out the passage of the light of lamps, which made their way through chinks in the houses where they were burning.

⁵ Karkati saw a band of female pisacha ghosts dancing about her as her companions. She became motionless as a block of wood on seeing giddy vetala ghosts moving about with human skeletons in their hands. ⁶ She saw antelope sleeping by her and the ground matted over by thick snow fall. The breeze gently shook drizzling drops of dew and frost from the leaves of trees. ⁷ She heard frogs croaking in the bogs and night ravens cawing from the hollows of trees. The mingled noise of happy men and women came from the inside of the houses. ⁸ She saw phosphorescent light burning in swamps with the luster of portentous meteors. She found banks and streams thick with thorns and thistles growing by their sides and washed by the waters gliding below them. ⁹ She looked above and saw groups of stars shining in the firmament. She saw the forest about her, the breeze shaking their fruit and flowers. ¹⁰ She heard the alternate and constant cries of owls and crows in the hollows of trees. She listened also to the shouts of robbers in the outskirts and the wailings of villagers at a distance. ¹¹ Foresters were silent in their native woods and citizens were fast asleep in the cities. Winds were howling in the forests and birds were at rest in their woodland nests. ¹² Furious lions lay in their dens and deer were lying in their caves. The sky was full of frozen dew and the woodlands were all still and quiet. ¹³ Lightning flashing from dark inky clouds resembled the reflections of rays from the bosom of a crystal mountain. The clouds were as thick as solid clay and the darkness was as stiff as if it needed a sword to cut it. ¹⁴ Blown by the storm, dark clouds fled in the air like the dark Anjana Mountain, then deluged a flood of pitchy rain like a waterfall from the bosom of a mountain. ¹⁵ The night was as dark as the pit of a coal-mine, and as jet black as the wing of the black bee. The whole landscape, lulled to sleep, appeared like the world lying submerged under ignorance.

¹⁶ In this dreadful dead of night in the area inhabited by Kiratas, she saw a king and his minister wandering together in the forest. ¹⁷ The king was named Vikrama and he was as brave and valorous as his name and conduct implied him to be. He came out undaunted from within the city, after the citizens had fallen fast-asleep. ¹⁸ Karkati saw them wandering in the forest with the weapons of their valor and fortitude, looking for the vetala ghosts that infested the neighborhood.

¹⁹ Seeing them, she was glad to think that at last she had found a proper food. But she wanted to know beforehand whether they were ignorant folks or had any knowledge of their souls, or whether their weariness under the burden of their bodies had exposed them to the dangers of the dark night.

²⁰ “The lives of the unlearned,” she thought to herself, “truly are damned in this world and the next.

Therefore it is better to put an end to these rather than leave them to live to their peril in both worlds.

²⁴ “But if they prove to be men of good and great souls, then in that case I cannot feel disposed of my own nature to put an end to their valuable lives. ²⁵ Therefore I must test them to see if they possess such intelligence. If so, I will decline to make them my food because I feel averse to molesting the intelligent. ²⁶ For those who expect to have true glory and real happiness throughout their lives on earth must always honor the learned with gifts adequate to their parts and desires. ²⁷ I should rather suffer my body to perish with hunger than destroy the intelligent for its support. The soul derives more satisfaction from the counsels of the wise than bare life without knowledge can possibly afford. ²⁸ The learned are to be supported even at the expense of one’s own life because the society of the wise is a tonic for the soul, though death should deprive us of our bodies.”

³² “I will now ask a few questions to test them, like copper by a chemical process, and know whether they are men of character or gilded on the surface with wise looks. ³³ Upon examination and ascertainment of the qualifications, if they prove to be wiser than the examiner, then one should avail of their instruction. Otherwise there is no harm to make an end of them as they best deserve.”

The rakshasi, who was an offshoot of the great garden of the rakshasa demon race, made a loud and tremendous yell like the deep roaring of a cloud. ² After her deep roar she muttered in a clattering voice like the rattling of a thunder clap following the rumbling of clouds. ³ She said, “Ho, ho? What are you who venture abroad in this dread and dreary desert, dark as the great illusion of maya, which without the light of the sun or moon is as gloomy as the gloom of ignorance? Why are you crawling here like insects bred in stones? ⁴ What men of great minds are you to have come here like weak minded deviants who have lost their way? You have become an easy prey for me and must meet your fate in my hands in a moment.”

²⁷ Now let us know your desire and what is your object with us, because no suitor who has come to us has been refused of his prayer, or allowed to return in disappointment.”

³² “I understand them to be acquainted with spiritual knowledge, without which there cannot be a good understanding. Because knowledge of the indestructibility of the spirit takes away the fear of death, and these men lack that fear. ³³ Therefore I shall ask them something about which I have doubts. They who fail to ask the wise what they know not must remain dunces throughout their lives.”

³⁴ Having thought so, she opened her mouth, suppressing her roaring voice and loud laughter for a while, and asked her questions. ³⁵ “Tell me, O you sinless men who are so brave and valiant, who are you and from where have you come? The very sight of you has raised my regard for you, like the good hearted become friends with one another, even at their first sight.”

³⁶ The minister said, “This is the king of the Kiratas and I am his councilor. We have come out tonight in our nightly round to apprehend malicious beings like you. ³⁷ It is the duty of princes to punish the wicked, both by day and night. Those who trespass the bounds of their duty must be made like fuel to the fire of destruction.”

unacquainted with this rule is not fit to be either a ruler or his minister.⁴² If you know this fundamental principle, it is good and you shall prosper. Otherwise you wrong yourselves and your subjects. In which case, you shall be my prey.”

⁴³ “There is only one way for you two young men to escape from my clutches. You must answer my intricate questions according to your best wits and judgment.⁴⁴ Now you king and you his counselor give me the solution to the questions that I ask of you. If you fail to give the proper answers as you have agreed to do, then you must then fall under my hands, like anyone who fails to keep his words.”

Chapter 79 — The Rakshasi Karkati's Questions

After saying so, the fiend began to ask her questions. You should be attentive to them Rama, like the king who told her to go on.

² The rakshasi resumed:—

What is that miniscule atomic particle that is one yet many, and is as vast as the ocean, and which contains innumerable worlds like the bubbles of the sea? ³ What is a void yet no void, which is something yet nothing? What makes me and you, and where do I or you abide and subside? ⁴ What moves unmoved and unmoving, and stands without stopping? What is intelligent yet is as dull as a stone? What presents its variety in the emptiness of understanding?

⁵ What has the nature of fire without its burning quality? What is that non-flammable substance that produces fire and its flame? ⁶ Who is not of the nature of the ever-changing solar, lunar and stellar lights, but is the never changing enlightener of the sun, moon and stars? Who, having no eyes, gives the eye its sight? ⁷ Who gives eyesight to the eyeless vegetables and the blind mineral creation?

⁸ Who is the maker of heavens and who is the author of the natures of things? Who is the source of this world of jewels and whose treasure are all the gems contained in it? ⁹ What is that monad which shines in darkness and is the point that is and is not? What is that iota which is imperceptible to all, and what is that jot that becomes an enormous mountain? ¹⁰ To whom is the twinkling of the eye as long as a kalpa millennium and a whole age only a moment? Whose omnipresence is equal to his absence, and whose omniscience is the same as his total ignorance? ¹¹ Who is called spirit but is no air in itself? Who is said to be sound or word but is none of them himself?

He is called the All, but is nothing at all of all that exists. He is known as Ego, but no ego is he himself.

Who, being only an atom in creation, does not reckon the great Mount Meru as a particle? ¹⁴ What is no more than an atom and fills a space of many leagues? What atomic particle is measured in many miles? ¹⁵ Whose glance and nod makes all beings act their parts as players? What minute particle contains many mountain chains in its bosom? ¹⁶ Who is bigger than Mount Meru in his minuteness and who, being smaller than the point of a hair, is higher than the highest rock?

as a tree in its seed, and by what power do the unproductive seeds of atoms become productive of worlds? ²² Whose glance causes the production of the world, like from its seed? Who creates the world without any motive or material? ²³ Who has no visual organs and enjoys the pleasure of seeing (drishti) and is the viewer (drashta) of himself, which he makes the object of his view? ²⁴ Who has no object of vision before him, sees nothing without him, but looks upon himself as an infinity void of everything visible within it? ²⁵ Who shows the subjective sight of the soul by itself as an objective view and represents the world like the shape of a bracelet in his own metal? ²⁶ Who has nothing existent beside himself, and in whom all things exist, like the waves existing in the waters, and whose will makes them appear as different things?

²⁷ Both time and space are equally infinite and indivisible, like the essence of God in which they exist. Then why do we try to differentiate and separate them like water from its fluidity? ²⁸ What inner cause in us makes the soul believe the unreal world to be real, and why does this fallacy continue at all times? ²⁹ The knowledge of the worlds, whether present, past or future, is all a great error. Yet what is that immutable being that contains the seed of this phenomenal wilderness? ³⁰ What being, without changing itself and before it develops itself into creation, shows these phenomena such as the shape of the seed of the world that becomes the form of a developed forest of created beings?

Tell me all these, O clear sighted and fair faced king, for the satisfaction of my heart. ³³ Let your answer melt down the doubt that has covered the face of my heart as with snow. If it fails to completely efface this dirt of doubt from the surface of my heart, I will never account it as the saying of the wise. ³⁴ But if you fail to lighten my heart of its doubts and set it at ease, then know for certain that you shall immediately be made fuel to the fire of my bowels. ³⁵ I shall fill this big belly of mine with all the people of your realm. But should you answer rightly, you shall reign in peace. Otherwise, you shall meet your end like the ignorant who are satisfied with the enjoyments of life.

³⁶ Saying so, the nocturnal fiend made a loud shout like a roaring cloud to express her joy. Then she sat silently with her fearful features, like a light hearted cloud in autumn.

After the giant-like descendent of rakshasas had asked her occult questions in the deep gloom of night in that thick forest, the good and great minister began to give his replies.

² The minister said:—

Hear me, you dark and cloud-like form, unravel your riddling questions with as much ease as a lion foils the fury of gigantic elephants. ³ All your questions relate to the Supreme Spirit and are framed in enigmatic language to test the force of our penetration into their hidden meanings.

⁴ The soul is identical to consciousness which is more minute than a particle of air. That is the atomic principle that you asked about because it is a nameless atom imperceptible by the six organs of sense and unintelligible to the mind. ⁵ Underlying the atomic consciousness is the minute seed that contains this universe. Whether it is a substantial or unsubstantial reality, nobody can say.

⁶ It is called a reality from our notion of it being the soul of all by itself. It is from that soul that all other existences have come in to being. ⁷ It is a void from its outward emptiness, but it is no void as regards its consciousness (which is a reality). Because it cannot be perceived, it is said to be nothing, but because it is imperishable, it is a subtle something. ⁸ It is not a nothing because it permeates all things. All things are only reflections of the minute Consciousness, and its unity shines forth in the plurality, all which is as unreal as the form of a bracelet made of gold substance.

⁹ This atom is the transcendental vacuum. It is imperceptible owing to its minuteness. Though it is situated in all things, it is unperceived by the mind and external senses. ¹⁰ Its universal permeation cannot make it nothing, because all that exists is not That, which alone is known as the thinking principle that makes us speak, see and act. ¹¹ No kind of reasoning can establish the non-entity of real existence because it is not capable of being seen by anybody. Yet the Universal Soul is known in its hidden form, like the unseen camphor by its smell.

¹² The unlimited soul resides in all limited bodies, and the atomic consciousness pervades the vast universe in the same manner as the mind fills all bodies in its purely subtle state unknown to the senses. ¹³ It is one and all, unity as well as plurality, because it is the soul of each and all, both singly as well as collectively, and because it supports and contains each and all by and within itself. ¹⁴ All these worlds are like little billows in the vast ocean of Divine Consciousness whose intelligence, like a liquid body, shows itself in the form of eddies in the water. ¹⁵ This minute intellect, being imperceptible to the senses and the mind, is said to be of the form of emptiness. But being perceived by our consciousness, it is not a nothing, although of the nature of a void in itself.

¹⁶ I am That and so are you by our conviction of the unity. But if we only believe ourselves to be composed of our bodies, then I am not That, nor you are He. ¹⁷ If we rid our sense of “I” and “you” through our knowledge of truth, we cease to be the ego, and you and all other persons lose all their properties in the sole unity.

¹⁸ This particle of consciousness is immovable, though it moves over thousands of miles. We find that in our consciousness, this particle has many a mile composed in it. ¹⁹ The mind is firmly seated in the empty intellect from which it never stirs, though it goes to all places where it is never located.²⁰ That which has its seat in the body can never go out of it, just like a baby hanging on the breast of its mother cannot look to another place for its rest.²¹ One who is free to range over large tracts will never leave his own home where he has the liberty and power to do all he likes.²² Wherever the mind may wander, it is never affected by the climate of that place, just like a jar taken to a distant country with its lid shut does not yield any passage to the light and air of that region into it.

²³ The thinking and non-thinking of consciousness, both being perceived in our minds, is said to be the exercise of intellect and the dullness of the intellect.²⁴ When our exercise of intellect is assimilated into the solid substance of Divine Consciousness, then our intellect is said to become solidified as a stone.

²⁵ The consciousness of the Supreme Being has spread worlds in the infinite space that are most wonderful as they are his uncreated creations.²⁶ The Divine Soul is of the essence of fire, and never forsakes its form of fire. It inheres in all bodies without burning them, and it is the enlightener and purifier of all substances.²⁷ The blazing intelligence of the Divine Soul, purer than the ethereal sphere, produces the elemental fire by its presence.²⁸ The intellect, which is the light of the soul and enlightener of the lights of the luminous sun, moon and stars, is indestructible and never fades, although the light of the luminaries is lost on the last day of universal doom.

³⁵ Because His nature is beyond understanding, He is said to be a speck of obscurity. Because of the brightness of His intellect, He is said to be a ray of light. Because we are conscious of Him, He is known to exist. Because our sight cannot see Him, He is said to be non-existent.³⁶ He is said to be far away because He is invisible to our eyes, and to be near because His being is the nature of our consciousness. He is described as a mountain because He is the totality of our consciousness, although He is more minute than any perceptible particle.³⁷ His consciousness manifests itself in the form of the universe. Mountains are not real existences. They exist like Meru in his atomic substratum.

³⁸ A twinkling is what appears as a short instant, and a kalpa epoch is the long duration of an age.

³⁹ Sometimes an instant, when it is filled with acts and thoughts of an age, represents a kalpa, just like an extensive country of many miles can be pictured in miniature or in a grain of the brain.⁴⁰ The course of a long kalpa is sometimes represented in the womb of an instant, just like the time to build a great city is present in the small space of a mind's memory, as it is in the reflection of a mirror.⁴¹ As little moments and kalpa ages, high mountains and extensive miles may abide in a single grain of the intellect, so do all dualities and pluralities unite and meet in the unity of God.

⁴² That "I have done this and that before" is an impression derived from the thought of our actual actions and activity. But the truth thereof becomes as untrue as our doings in a dream.⁴³ It is calamity that prolongs the course of time, and our prosperity diminishes its duration, just like the short space of a single night appeared like twelve long years to King Harishchandra in his misery.

⁴⁴ Anything that appears as a certain truth to the mind stamps the same impression in the soul. It is the same as the impression of a golden jewelry is deeper in the soul than the idea of its gold.⁴⁵ There is nothing like a moment or an age, or anything like near or far to the soul. It is the idea in the minute intellect that creates their length or brevity, and nearness or remoteness.⁴⁶ The opposites of light and darkness, nearness and distance, and a moment and an age, are only varied impressions on the unvaried percipient mind. There is no real difference.

⁴⁷ All things or objects that are perceptible to the senses are called evident or apparent. That which lies beyond them is said to be imperceptible or unapparent. But visual sensation is not self-evident, only the vision of consciousness which is the real essence.⁴⁸ As long as there is the knowledge of the jewel, there is the knowledge of the gem also, that of the real gem being lost under the apparent form.⁴⁹ By restoring attention away from the visible form of the jewel to its real essence that one is led to the sight of the pure light of the only one Brahman.

⁵⁰ Brahma is viewed as reality (sat) when He is thought of as pervading all things. He is said to be unreal (asat) because He is not the object of vision. Consciousness is said to be a reality from its faculty of exercise of intellect. Otherwise it is a stolid or dull matter.⁵¹ Consciousness is the wonderful property of the Divine Spirit in which it is present as its object (chetya). But how can a man see Consciousness if his mind is fixed to the sight of a world that is a shadow of Consciousness and moves like a tree shaken by the wind?

⁵⁷ There is no difference between a house and a void other than that the one is the object of vision and the other of consciousness. Again, all nature teeming with life is said to live in God who is light and life of all for evermore. ⁵⁸ But all these living beings have no room in the empty sphere of Divine Consciousness. They live and shine like solar rays proceeding imperceptibly from that luminous orb. ⁵⁹ A difference appears in these rays, both from the original light and from one another, by a curious design of Providence. But it the same in all, like the forms of the trees growing out of the same kind of seed.

⁶⁰ As the tree contained in the seed is of the same kind as the parent seed, so the innumerable worlds contained in the empty seed of Brahma are also as empty as Brahma himself. ⁶¹ As the tree which is yet undeveloped in the seed does not exist without development of its parts, so the world in the womb of Brahma was discernible only to Divine Consciousness.

⁶² There is only one God who is one and uncreated, calm and quiet, without beginning, middle or end, and without a body and its parts. He has no duality and is one in many. He is of the form of pure light, and shines for ever with everlasting and undiminished luster.

Chapter 81 — The King's Answers

¹ The Rakshasi said, “Well said, O councilor! Your explanations are sanctifying and filled with spiritual doctrines. Now let the king with lotus eyes answer the other questions.”

² The king answered:—

He whose belief consists in the renunciation of all reliance on this world, and whose attainment depends upon forsaking all the desires of the heart, ³ whose expansion and contraction causes the creation and extinction of the world, who is the object of the doctrines of Vedanta, and who is inexpressible by words or speech of humankind, ⁴ who is between the two extremes of doubt (whether he is or is not), and who is between both extremes (that he is and is not), and whose pleasure (will) displays the world with all its animate and inanimate beings, ⁵ whose universal permeation does not destroy His unity, who being the soul of all is still but one, He alone, O lady, is truly said to be the eternal Brahma.

⁶ This minute particle is falsely conceived as spirit (air) because it is invisible to the naked eye, but in truth, it is neither air nor any other thing except pure Consciousness. ⁷ This smallest of particles is said to be sound or words, but it is error to say so because it is far beyond the reach of sound or the sense of words. ⁸ That particle is all yet nothing. It is neither I, you or he. It is the Almighty Soul and its power is the cause of all. ⁹ It is the soul that is attainable with great pains, and which being gained adds nothing to our possession. But its attainment is attended with the gain of the Supreme Soul. There is no better gain.

¹¹ Those who are in easy circumstances in life lose their souls by viewing themselves only as solid bodies that rise quickly to view like a dense mirage by light of the sun.

It is like comparing a mountain with a mustard seed, which is absurd.²³ The minuteness attributed to the Divine Spirit (in the Vedas) is as false as attributing different colors to a peacock's feathers, and of jewelry to gold, which can not be applicable to the spirit.

²⁴ It is that bright lamp that has brought forth light from its thought without any loss of its own essential brightness.²⁵ If the sun and other luminous bodies in the world were dull and dark in the beginning, then what was the nature of the primeval light and where was it?²⁶ The pure essence of the mind situated in the soul saw the light displayed on the outside by its internal particle of the intellect.²⁷ There is no difference between the lights of the sun, moon and fire and the darkness, out of which these lights were produced. The only difference is that of the two colors, black and white.²⁸ As the difference between clouds and snows consists in the blackness of the one and whiteness of the other, such is the difference between light and darkness, only in their colors not in their substance.²⁹ Both of these being inanimate in their nature, there is no difference between them. They both disappear or join with one another before the light of consciousness. They disappear before the intellectual light of the yogi who, under the blaze of his consciousness, perceives no physical light or darkness in his abstract meditation. They join together as light and shade, the shadow inseparably following the light.

³⁰ The sun of consciousness shines by day and night without setting or sleeping. It shines in the bosom of even hard stones without being clouded or having its rise or fall.³¹ The light of this blazing soul has lighted the sun, which diffuses its light all over the three worlds. It has filled the capacious womb of earth with a variety of provisions, just they store large baskets of food in a warehouse.³² It enlightens darkness without destroying itself, and the darkness that receives the light becomes as enlightened as light itself.

³³ As the shining sun brings the lotus buds to light, so the light of the Divine Spirit enlightens our intellects amidst the gloom of ignorance that envelopes them.³⁴ As the sun displays himself by making day and night by his rise and fall, so does the intellect show itself by its development and restraint by turns.³⁵ All our notions and ideas are contained in the particle of the intellect, just like a healthy seed contains in its breast the leaves, flowers and fruits of the future tree.³⁶ These and all the powers of the mind develop themselves in their proper times, like flowers and fruits make their appearance in spring and proper seasons.

In answer to "who are forsaken by and supported by the Divine Spirit,"⁴⁰ it is He who, being unable to wrap himself, wraps the world in Him by spreading out the clothing of his atomic consciousness over all existence.⁴¹ The Supreme Spirit is of the form of infinite space. It cannot hide itself in anything within its sphere, which would be like hiding an elephant in grass.⁴² Yet this all-knowing spirit encompasses the world, knowing it to be a trifle, just like a child holding a grain of rice in his hand. This is an act of illusion (maya).

⁴⁷ Myriads of kalpas amount to an infinitesimal part of a twinkling of the atomic consciousness, as a momentary dream presents a man with all the periods of his life, from youth to age. In answer to, “What twinkling of the eye appears as many thousand kalpas,” ⁴⁸ even this infinitesimal of a twinkling is too long for thousands of kalpas. The whole duration of existence is as short as a wink of His eye. ⁴⁹ Only an idea makes a twinkling appear a kalpa or many kalpas, just as the idea of satiety in starvation is a mere delusion to the deluded soul.

⁶⁰ The words ‘external’ and ‘internal’ as applied to the world are meaningless and not positive terms. There is no inside or outside of the Divine Soul. These are contrived for the instruction of pupils to explain its different views by consciousness. ⁶¹ The viewer looking into the invisible being within himself comes to see the soul. He who looks on the outside with his open eyes comes to view the unreal as real. ⁶² Therefore whoever looks into the soul can never see false phenomena as realities as others do. ⁶³ It is the internal sight of consciousness that looks into the inner soul which is without all desires. The external eyes are mere organs to look upon the false appearance of outer objects.

⁷³ When the viewer perceives the unreality of what can be seen by the light of his understanding, then he comes to see the true reality. So by withdrawing the mind from seeing the bracelet form, one comes to see only its nature of gold. ⁷⁴ If what can be seen is present, there must also be their viewers to whose view they are apparent. It is the absence of both viewer and the seen, and the knowledge of their unreality, that produce the belief of unity.

⁸¹ The Supreme Soul exists alone unbounded by time or space. Being the Universal Soul, it is the soul of all. Being omniscient, it is no dull matter at all. ⁸² The self-existent, being only consciousness, is not perceptible to sight. There is unity and no duality in it, but all forms unite into one in the great self of the Supreme. ⁸³ If there is a duality, it is the one and its unity. The unity and duality of the Universal Soul are both as true as the light and its shade joined together. ⁸⁴ Where there is no duality or any number above it, unity can have no application to anything, and where there is no unity, there cannot be any two or more over it because they are only repetitions of the unity.

⁸⁵ Anything is in itself such as it is. It cannot be more or less than itself, but is identical with itself like water and its fluidity. ⁸⁶ The multiplicity of forms which it exhibits blends into a harmonic whole without conflict with one another. The varieties within creation are contained in Brahma, like a tree with all its several parts in the embryonic seed. ⁸⁷ Its dualism is as inseparable from it as the bracelet from its gold. Although the many forms in nature are evident to comprehensive understanding, yet it is not true of the true Entity. ⁸⁸ Like fluidity of water, the movement of air, and the emptiness of the sky, this variety of forms is an inseparable property of God. ⁸⁹ A systematic inquiry into unity and duality is the cause of misery to the restless spirit. It is the lack of any such distinction that is the highest knowledge.

¹⁰⁰ There is no world and no non-world other than consciousness which is all of itself and is said to be such and such in any place or time, as it appears so and so to us there and then. ¹⁰¹ It rises as if unrisen, and expands in its own knowledge. It is selfsame with the Supreme Soul, and as the totality of all selves, it spreads through the entire emptiness like air.

¹⁰² Like a tree springs from the ground according to its seed, so the world appears to sight in the form as contained in the seed of consciousness. ¹⁰³ The plant does not quickly quit its seed, lest it would dry up and die for want of its sap. So the man who sticks to the soul and seed of his being is free from disease and death.

¹⁰⁴ Mount Meru is like the filament of a flower compared to the vastness of that atom. Everything that can be sensed has its place in that invisible atom. ¹⁰⁵ Meru is truly a filament of the atomic flower of the Divine Soul, and myriads of Merus resemble the cloudy spots rising in the sphere of Consciousness. ¹⁰⁶ It is that one great atom that fills the world, after having made it out of itself and given it a visible, extended and material form in its own hollow sphere.

Chapter 82 — Friendship with the Rakshasi; Criminals as Food

The silly Karkati of the forest, having heard the king's speech, pondered well the sense of the words and forsook her levity and malice. ² She found the coolness and tranquility of her heart after its fervor was over, just like a peacock when the rains set in, or a lotus bed at the rising of moonbeams. ³ The king's words delighted her heart like the cries of cranes flying in the sky gladden the passing clouds in the air.

¹⁶ The king replied, "If that be so, you who lives on animal flesh, tell me how can you support your body if you abstain from animal food?"

¹⁷ The rakshasi replied, "It has been six months, O king, since I have risen from my samadhi meditation and fostered my desire for food, which I wholly renounce today. ¹⁸ I will return to the mountain top, resume my steadfast meditation, and sit there contented as long as I like in the posture of an unmoving statue. ¹⁹ I will restrain myself by unshaken meditation until my death, and then I shall quit this body in its time with gladness. This is my resolution."

²⁰ "I tell you now, O king, that until the end of this life and body of mine, I shall no more take the life of any living being, and you may rely assured upon my word. ²¹ There is Mount Himalaya by name, standing in the heart of the northern region and stretching in one sweep from the vast east to west.

²² At first I lived there in a cave by its golden peak. I was in the shape of an iron statue, and also like a cloud fragment, and I bore the name of Karkati the Rakshasi.²³ There by the austerity of my meditation I obtained the sight of Brahma and I expressed my desire to kill mankind in the shape of a destructive needle.²⁴ I obtained the boon accordingly and passed a great many years in the act of afflicting living beings and feeding on their entrails in the form of choleric pain.”

²⁵ “Then Brahma prohibited me from killing the learned and he instructed me in the great mantra. ²⁶ He gave me the power of piercing the hearts of men with some other diseases that infest all mankind. ²⁷ I spread myself far and wide in my malice and sucked the heart blood of men, which dried up their veins and arteries and emaciated their bodies. ²⁸ Those I left alive after devouring their flesh and blood begat a race as lean and without veins as they had become themselves.”

²⁹ “You will be successful, O happy king, in getting the mantra for driving away cholera pain, because there is nothing impossible that the wise and strong cannot attain. ³⁰ Receive immediately, O king, the mantra that Brahma uttered to remove choleric pain from the cells of arteries weakened by cholera. ³¹ Come and let us go to the nearby river. After you are both prepared by washing and purification, then I will initiate you with the mantra.”

³² Vasishta said:—

Then the rakshasi proceeded to the river side that very night accompanied by the king and his minister, all joined together as friends. ³³ These two men, being sure of the rakshasi’s friendship by both affirmative and negative proofs, made their ablutions and stood on the river bank. ³⁴ Then the rakshasi tenderly told them the mantra that Brahma had revealed to her to remove cholera pain, and which was always successful.

³⁹ The rakshasi replied, “You can well provide a female of your own kind with her proper food, but what entertainment can you give to my satisfaction? I am a cannibal by nature!⁴⁰ It is only a rakshasa’s food that can satisfy me, not the little morsels of petty mortals. This is the innate nature of our being and it can not be done away with as long as we carry our present bodies.”

⁴¹ The king answered, “Ornamented with necklaces of gold, you shall be at liberty to remain with the ladies in my house for as many days as you may like to stay. ⁴² Then, for your food, I will produce the robbers and felons that I seize in my territories. You will have them supplied to you constantly by the hundreds and thousands. ⁴³ Then you can then forsake your attractive form, resume your hideous rakshasi figure, and kill hundreds of those lawless men for your food. ⁴⁴ Take them to the top of the snowy mountain and devour them at your pleasure. Great men always like to take their meals in privacy.”

are tired with your meditation, you can come back to this place. ⁴⁶ You can then take other offenders for your slaughter. Killing culprits is not only justifiable by law, it amounts to an act of mercy to rid them of their punishment in the next world. ⁴⁷ You must return to me when you are tired of your meditation because friendship, even that formed with the wicked, is not easily done away.”

⁴⁸ The rakshasi replied, “You have spoken well, king, and I will do as you say. For who is there that will slight the words of the wise spoken to him in the way of friendship?”

⁴⁹ Vasishtha said:—

Saying so, the rakshasi assumed a graceful form and wore necklaces and bracelets, and silken robes and laces. ⁵⁰ She said, “Well king, let us go together,” then followed the footsteps of the king and his counselor who walked before her and led the way.

⁵¹ Having arrived at the royal residence, they passed that night with their agreeable meal and discourse together. ⁵² As it became morning, the rakshasi went inside the house and remained there with the women. Meanwhile the king and the minister attended to their business. ⁵³ Over the course of six days, the king collected together all the offenders he had seized in his territory and from other parts. ⁵⁴ These amounted to three thousand heads which he gave to her.

She resumed her fierce dark form of the black fiend of the night. ⁵⁵ She laid hold of thousands of men in her extended grasp, like a cloud fragment holds drops of rainwater in its wide bosom. ⁵⁶ She took leave of the king and went with her prey to the mountain top, just like a poor man takes gold that he happened to find in some hidden place. ⁵⁷ For three days and nights she refreshed herself with her food and rested. Then regaining the firmness of her understanding, she employed herself in meditation.

⁵⁸ After four or five or sometimes seven years passed, she used to get up from her tapas and return to where men live and to the court of the king. ⁵⁹ There they passed some time in confidential conversation, then she returned with her prey of the offenders to her mountain seat. ⁶⁰ Thus freed from cares even in her lifetime, she continued to remain as a liberated being in that mountain.

Chapter 83 — Worship of Karkati as Kandara Devi or Mangala Devi

The rakshasi continued her meditation and remained on friendly terms with the successive rulers of the Kirata country who kept supplying her with her rations. ² By the power of her perfection in the practice of yoga meditation, she continued to prevent all possibility of evils, to ward off all dread and danger from demons, and to remove diseases from the people. ³ Over the course of her many years in meditation, she used to come out of her cell at certain intervals and call at headquarters to take the living creatures collected and kept to be her victims. ⁴ The practice is still observed by the kings of that place who sacrifice animals to her departed ghost on the hill, because none can be negligent to repay the good services of his benefactor.

Chapter 84 — Imperfect Words Used to Guide to Understanding; the Power of the Mind

Rama, I have told you the worthy legend of Karkati, the rakshasi of Imaus, from beginning to end.

² Rama replied, “But how could one born in a cave of the Himalayas become a black rakshasi, and why was she called Karkati? These I want clearly explained.”

³ Vasishta replied:—

Rakshasa cannibals originally are of many races. Some are of dark and others of fair complexions, while many have a yellowish appearance and some of a greenish shade. ⁴ As for Karkati, you must know that there was a rakshasa named Karkata because of his exact resemblance to a crab. ⁵ I only told you the story of Karkati because of her questions which I remembered and thought would serve well to explain the omniform God in our discourse into spiritual knowledge.

¹¹ As the products of the seed, from its sprout to the fruit, are all of the same species, so the thoughts (chetayas) of the mind (chitta) are of the same nature as those originally implanted in it. ¹² According to the law of the continuity of the same essence, there is no difference in the nature of the seed and its fruit. So consciousness (chit) and the thoughts (chetayas) differ in nothing except in their forms, like the waves and water differ in external appearance and not in their intrinsic substance (vastu). ¹³ No demonstration can show any difference between thoughts, mind and consciousness. Whatever distinction our judgment may make, it is easily refuted by right reasoning.

¹⁴ Let this error therefore vanish. It has come from nothing to nothing and like all causeless falsities, it fails of itself. You will know more of this, Rama, when you are awakened to divine knowledge. In the meantime, do away with the error of seeing duality that is different from the only existent unity.

¹⁵ After your attention to my lectures cuts the knot of your error, you yourself will come to know the significance and substance of what is called the true knowledge that is taken in different senses by various schools of philosophy. That which comes of itself in the mind is the intuitive knowledge of divine truth.

¹⁶ You have a mind like that of the common people, full of mistakes and blunders. All this will undoubtedly subside in your mind through your attention to my lectures. ¹⁷ You will be awakened by my sermons to know this certain truth, that all things proceed from Brahma into whom they ultimately return.

¹⁹ Vasishta answered:—

Words are used in the scriptures to instruct others. Where any inconsistency appears, they are explained. ²⁰ Hence, although not strictly true, we use a difference between visible phenomena and the invisible Brahma, just like we speak of ghosts appearing to children, though there are no such things in reality. ²¹ In reality there is no duality connected with the unity of Brahma, just as there is no dualism between a city and the sleep dream in which it appears. Again, God being immutable in his nature and eternal in decree, it is wrong to apply the mutations of nature and the mutability of will to Him. ²² The Lord is free from the states of causality and the caused, of instrumentality and instruments, of a whole and its part, and those of proprietorship and property. ²³ He is beyond all affirmative and negative propositions, and their legitimate conclusions or false deductions and refutations. ²⁴ So it is equally false to attribute the original will to God. Yet it is usual to say so for the instruction of the ignorant. There is no change in His nature from its nothing to slight wish.

²⁵ These conscious terms and figurative expressions are used to guide the ignorant. The knowing few are far from falling into the fallacy of dualism. All intellectual conceptions cease upon the spiritual perception of God. There ensues an utter and dumb silence. ²⁶ When in time you come to know these things better, you shall arrive at the conclusion that all this is only one thing, an undivided whole without parts and having no beginning or end.

³³ All these prospective worlds are machinations and the workings of the mind. Having forsaken these false fabrications of fancy, you will have tranquility of your soul and abide in peace with yourself forever. ³⁴ By paying your attention to the drift of my preaching, you from your own reasoning will be able to find a mite of the medicine that cures all the illnesses of your deluded mind.

³⁵ If you sit in silent meditation, you will see the whole world in your mind. All outward bodies will disappear like drops of oil in sand.³⁶ The mind is the seat of the universe as long as it is not weakened by passions and affections and afflictions of life. When the mind is rid of the turmoil of its present state, it is set beyond the world (in heavenly bliss).³⁷ The mind is the means to accomplish anything. It is the store-keeper to preserve all things in the warehouse of its memory. It is the faculty of reasoning, and the power to act like a respectable person. Therefore the mind is to be treated with respect as it recalls, restrains and guides us in our pursuits and duties.

³⁸ The mind contains within it the three worlds with all their contents and the surrounding air. It exhibits itself as the fullness of ego and the cornucopia of all in its microcosm.³⁹ The intellectual part of the mind contains the subjective self-consciousness of ego, which is the seed of all its powers. The other part, its objective part, bears in itself the false forms of the dull material world.

⁴¹ He saw the whole creation in the self-consciousness of his vast mind, and he saw all material objects, the hills and all, in the knowledge (samvid) of his gross personal consciousness. At last by his subtle sightedness (sukshma vid, subtle knowledge or clairvoyance) he perceived that all gross bodies were as empty as air and not solid substances.⁴² The mind with its embodying thoughts is pervaded by the omnipresent soul that is spread out as transparently as sunbeams upon clear water.

⁴⁶ Speech which is without suitable comparisons and graceful phraseology, which is inaudible or clamorous, or has inappropriate words and harsh sounding letters, cannot take possession of the heart. It is thrown away for nothing, like butter poured upon the burnt ashes of an offering that has no power to rekindle the flame.⁴⁷ Whatever stories there are in any language on earth, and whatever compositions are adorned with measured sentences and graceful diction, all these are rendered acutely insightful through conspicuous comparisons, as the world is enlightened by cooling moonbeams. Therefore almost every verse in this work is embellished with a suitable comparison.

Chapter 85 — Brahma Describes His Own Experience; Asks the Sun

I will relate to you Rama, agreeably to your request, the story that Brahma himself told me of old. The mind (manas) produced Manu, the progeny of the mind, who begat the Manujas otherwise called men (manavas or manushyas), the offspring of the mind. ² Once before I had asked the lotus-born god to tell me how these hosts of creation had come to being. ³ Then Brahma, the great progenitor of men, granted my request and related the story of the ten Aindava (Moon-like) brothers in his loud voice.

⁴ Brahma said:—

All this visible world is the manifestation of the Divine Mind, like circling whirlpools and rippling swirls of water on the surface of the sea. ⁵ Hear me tell you how I (the personified mind) first awoke on the day of creation in a former kalpa with my volition to create (expand) myself.

⁶ Previously I remained alone, quietly intent upon the creation at the end of the prior day (kalpa). I had compressed the whole creation in the focus of my mind and hid it under the gloom of the primeval night. ⁷ At the end of the chaotic night I awoke like from a deep sleep and performed my morning prayers as it is the general law (of all living beings).

I opened my eyes with a view to create and fixed my look on the emptiness all about me. ⁸ As far as I could see, it was empty space covered by darkness with no light of heaven. It was unlimitedly extensive, all void and without any boundary. ⁹ Being then determined to bring forth creation, and with the acuteness of my understanding, I began to discern the world in its simple (ideal) form within me. ¹⁰ Then I saw in my mind the great cosmos of creation, set unobstructed and apart from me in the wide extended field of emptiness. ¹¹ Then the rays of my reflection stretched out over them from amidst the lotus-cell of my abode, and sat in the form of ten lotus-born Brahmas over the ten worlds of this creation, like so many swans brooding upon their eggs. ¹² Then these separate orbs (cosmic eggs) brought forth multitudes of beings to light within their transparent aqueous atmospheres.

of black bees on high. The stars that twinkle in it are like the yellow filaments of flowers shaken by the winds. ²¹ The huge heaps of snow setting in the valleys of high hills resemble the lofty cottonwood trees beset by their pods of cotton. ²² The earth is surrounded by the polar mountains serving as her girdles, and the circles of polar seas serve as her sounding anklets and trinkets. She is covered by the polar darkness as if by a blue garment, and studded all about with gems growing and glowing in the bosoms of her rich and ample mines and seas. ²³ The earth, covered by the ornaments of her greenness of vegetation, resembles a lady sitting dressed in her robes, having the produce of rice for her food and the busy buzz of the world for her music.

²⁴ The sky appears like a bride veiled under the black covering of night, with glittering chains of stars for her jewels. Seasonal fruits and flowers hanging in the air resemble wreaths of lotuses about her body. ²⁵ The orbs of worlds appear like beautiful pomegranate fruits containing all their peoples in them, like the shining seeds in the cells of those fruit. ²⁶ Bright moonbeams, stretching both above and below and all around the three sides, appear like the white sacred thread girding the world above and below and all about, or like the Ganges River running in three directions in the upper, lower and nether worlds. ²⁷ The clouds dispersing on all sides with their glittering lightning appear like the leaves and flowers of air-borne forests, blown away by the breezes on all sides.

³¹ Having seen all these things in my pure and enlightened understanding, I was quite confounded to think from where all these could have come into being. ³² Why is it that I do not see all that I perceive with my visual organs, like a magic scene spread out in the sphere of my mind? ³³ Having looked into these for a long time with my steadfast attention, I called to me the brightest sun of these luminous spheres and addressed him saying, ³⁴ “Approach me, O god of gods, luminous Sun! I welcome you to me!” Having approached, I said, ³⁵ “Tell me what you are and how this world with all its bright orbs came to being. If you know anything of this, then please reveal it to me.”

³⁷ The Sun replied, “O lord, you are the eternal cause of these false phenomena. How is it that you do not know it and ask me about its cause? ³⁸ But should you, all knowing as you are, take a delight in hearing my speech, I will tell you of my unmasked and un-thought of production, which I beg you to listen to.”

Chapter 86 — The Sun's Story of Indu's and His Wife's Tapas & Their Ten Sons, the Aindavas

It was, my lord, only the other day of one of your previous kalpas, and at the foot of a mountain, beside the tableland of Mount Kailash that stands in a corner of the continent of Asia, ² that there lived a man named Suvarnajata together with all his sons and their progeny, who had made that place a beautiful and pleasant home.

¹⁵ Shiva said, "I am pleased with your meditation, O brahmin! Offer your prayer to me and have your desired reward granted to you immediately."

¹⁶ The brahmin replied, "O Lord of gods, please favor me with ten intelligent male children. Let these be born of me to dispel all my sorrows."

The god said, "Be it so," and then disappeared into the air. His great body passed through the ethereal path with a tremendous roar of thunder like the surge of the seas.

²⁴ In time these youths lost both parents who passed off their mortal coils to go to their last abode.

²⁵ Losing both parents, the ten brahmin lads left their home in grief and went to the top of Mount Kailash to pass their helpless lives in mourning.

³⁴ The eldest then replied to his younger brothers saying, “O you my worthy brothers, do as I say and you will be successful. ³⁵ Sit in lotus posture and think yourselves to be the bright Brahma, full of his brilliance and possessing the powers of creation and annihilation in yourselves.”

land and water decorated with all its oceans and continents, its mountains and islands, hanging like an earring in the material system.”

⁴⁷ “It is I who create, preserve and destroy the worlds. I remain in myself and pervade over all existence as the lord of all. ⁴⁸ I observe in myself the revolution of years and ages, and of all seasons and times, and I find the same time to be both the creator and destroyer of things. ⁴⁹ I see a kalpa passing away before me, and the night of Brahma (dissolution) stretched out in my presence, while I reside forever in the Supreme Soul, as full and perfect as the Divine Spirit itself.”

Chapter 87 — Ten Brother Aindavas Become the Ten Worlds of the Next Day of Brahma

O great father of creation, in this way these venerable brahmins remained at that spot for a long time, occupied in their minds with these various thoughts and their several actions. ² They remained in this state until their bodies dried up by exposure to the sun and air, and dropped down in time like the withered leaves of trees. ³ Their dead bodies were devoured by the voracious beasts of the forest, or tossed about like some ripe fruit by monkeys on the hills.

⁹ I have thus related to you O Brahma, how these ten brahmins were personified as so many Brahmas. These ten have become the ten bright orbs situated in the empty sphere of your mind. ¹⁰ I am the eldest among them, consecrated in this temple of the sky, and appointed by you, O lord of all, to regulate the portions of time on earthly beings.

Chapter 88 — Detachment of Brahma; Need to Act; Only One's Own Mind Can Change One's Own Mind

O brahmin who is the best of brahmins, the Sun God remained silent after telling me about the ten brahmins. ² I thought upon this for sometime in my mind, then said, “O Sun, tell me what I am to create next? ³ Tell me O Sun, what need is there for me to make any more worlds after these ten globes have come into existence?”

⁴ Now, O great sage, the Sun having long considered in his mind about what I wanted him to say, replied to me in the following manner in appropriate words.

⁵ The Sun said:—

My lord who is devoid of effort or desire, what need do you have to create? This work of creation is only for your pleasure. ⁶ O lord who is free from desires and gives rise to worlds like sunbeams raise waters, and the sunshine is accompanied by the shadow, ⁷ you are indifferent to fostering or forsaking your body and need nothing to desire or renounce for your pleasure or pain. ⁸ You, O lord of creatures, create all these only for the sake of your pleasure, and so you retract them all in yourself, as the sun by turns gives and withdraws his light. ⁹ You who is unattached to the world make your creation as a work of love to you, and not of any effort or endeavor on your part.

¹⁴ You derive pleasure, O Lord of worlds, from forming the orbs of the sons of Indu, so the Lord of Gods will give you your reward for your works of creation. ¹⁵ Nobody with their external organs of vision can see the worlds as clearly as you, O lord, see with the eyes of your mind. For who, by seeing them with his eyes, can say whether you are created or uncreated? ¹⁶ Only He who has created these worlds from his mind, and no other person with his open eyes, can behold me face to face.

¹⁷ The ten worlds are not the work of so many Brahmas as it appeared to you before. Nobody has the power to destroy them when they are seated so firmly in the mind. ¹⁸ It is easy to destroy what is made by the hand, and to shut out the sensible objects from our perception, but who can annul or disregard what is ascertained by the mind? ¹⁹ It is impossible for anyone except the owner to remove whatever belief is deep-rooted in the minds of living beings. ²⁰ No curse can remove from the mind whatever has become a habit of confirmed belief in the mind, even though it can kill the body.

²¹ Principle deeply rooted in the mind forms the man according to its stamp. It is impossible by any means to make him otherwise, as it is impossible to make a rock bear fruit by watering its root like a tree.

Chapter 89 — The Story of the Lovers Indra & Ahalya, the Fixation of Their Minds on Each Other

The mind is the maker and master of the world. The mind is the first supreme being (purusha). Whatever is done by the mind is said to be done. The actions of the body are held as no acts. ² Look at the capacity of the mind in the example of the sons of Indu. They were only ordinary brahmins, but by their meditation of Brahma in their minds, they became assimilated in Brahma.

³ One thinking himself as composed of the body becomes subject to all the incidents of physicality. But he who knows himself as bodiless is freed from all evils that attend the body. ⁴ Looking on the outside, we are subject to the feelings of pain and pleasure, but the inward-sighted yogi is unconscious of the pain or pleasure of his body. ⁵ Thus it is the mind that causes all our errors in this world. Evidence of this is the example of Indra and his consort Ahalya.

[The Yoga Vasishtha's story of two adulterous lovers, Indra and Ahalya, has many connections with another story that would have been well known to an India reader, that of Indra, king of the gods, seducing Ahalya, the wife of sage Gautama, one of the Seven Rishis. The sage cursed both Indra and his wife. The curse on Ahalya was removed by Rama. As the story became popular over time, the curse was that Ahalya was turned into a stone and came back to life when touched by Rama's foot.]

⁶ Brahma said, “Tell me, my Lord Sun, who was this Indra and who that Ahalya, so that by hearing my understanding may have its clear-sightedness.”

⁷ The Sun said:—

It is related my lord! In former times there reigned a king at Magadha, Indra-dyumna (Glorious Indra) by name and similar to his namesake (in prowess and fame). ⁸ He had a wife fair as the moon with eyes as beautiful as lotuses. Her name was Ahalya and she resembled Rohini, the moon's favorite. ⁹ In that city lived a rascal at the head of all the libertines. He was the cheating son of a brahmin, and was known by the same name of Indra.

¹⁴ She lost her modesty with her self possession. She repeated in her frenzy, “Here is Indra, and there he comes to me.”

¹⁵ Finding her in this pitiable plight, a lady of her palace took compassion on her, and said, “I will safely conduct Indra before your ladyship in a short time.” ¹⁶ No sooner did she hear her companion say, “I will bring your desired object to you,” than she opened her eyes with joy and fell prostrate at her feet, like one lotus flower falls before another. ¹⁷ Then as the day passed on, and the shade of night covered the face of nature, the lady made her haste to the house of Indra, the brahmin's boy.

²⁷ They were both cast in the cold water of a tank in cold weather where, instead of betraying any sign of pain, they kept smiling together as in their merriment. ²⁸ Then the king had them to be taken out of the tank and ordered them to repent for their crimes, but the infatuated pair was far from doing so, and replied to the king in the following manner.

²⁹ "Great king! As long we continue to reflect on the unblemished beauty of each other's face, so long are we lost in the meditation of one another and forget our own selves. ³⁰ We are delighted in our persecutions, as no torment can separate us from each other. We are not afraid of separation, even though you can separate our souls from our bodies."

³¹ They were thrown in a frying pan upon fire, where they remained unhurt and exclaimed, "We rejoice, O king, at the delight of our souls in thinking of one another." ³² They were tied to the feet of elephants to be trampled, but they remained uninjured and said, "King, we feel our hearty joy at our memories of each other." ³³ They were lashed with rods and straps and many other sorts of scourges which the king devised from time to time. ³⁴ But being brought back from the scourging ground and asked about their suffering, they returned the same answer as before.

Moreover, said the brahmin Indra to the king, "This world is full with the form of my beloved one. ³⁵ All your punishments inflict no pain on her because she views the whole world as full of myself. ³⁶ Therefore all your punishments to torment the body can give no pain to the mind (soul) which is my true self and constitutes my personality (purusha) that resides in my person. ³⁷ This body is only an ideal form and presents a shadowy appearance to view. You can pour out your punishments upon it for a while, but it amounts to no more than striking a shadow with a stick. ³⁸ Nobody can break down a brave (firm) mind. Then tell me great king, what do the powers of the mighty amount to?"

³⁹ "The causes that conspire to disturb the nature of the resolute mind are the false conceptions of external appearances. Therefore it is better to chastise such bodies which mislead the mind to error. ⁴⁰ The mind is forever firm that is steadfast to its fixed purpose. The mind identifies with the object which it has constantly in its thoughts. ⁴¹ Being and not being are words applicable to bodies. They do not apply to the mind because what is positive in thought cannot be negated of it in any way. ⁴² The mind is immovable and cannot be moved by any effort like one can move bodies. It is impregnable to all external actions, and neither your anger or favor can have any effect on it.”

“This black-eyed beauty is the fixed prop of my mind. ⁴⁵ She is seated in the lofty temple of my mind like Goddess Bhavani on Mount Kailash. I fear nothing as long as I see this beloved preserver of my life and soul before me. ⁴⁶ I sit amidst the conflagration of a burning mountain in summer’s heat, but wherever I stand or fall, I am cooled under the shadow of her showering cloud. ⁴⁷ I think of nothing except the only object of my thought and wish. I cannot persuade myself to believe me as any other than Indra, the lover of Ahalya.”

⁴⁸ “It is by constant association that I have come to this belief of myself. I cannot think of me otherwise than what is in my nature. Know, O king, that the wise have only one object in their thought and view. ⁴⁹ The mind, like Mount Meru, is not moved by threat or pity. It is the body that you can tame by the one or the other means. The wise, O king, are masters of their minds. There is none and nothing to deter them from their purpose.”

Chapter 90 — Indra's & Ahalya's Attachment through Reincarnations

The lotus-eyed king, thus defied by this perverse Indra, addressed sage Bharata who was sitting by him. ² The king spoke, “Lord, you are acquainted with all morality. See this ravisher of my wife and hear the arrogant speech that he utters before our face. ³ Please, O great sage, pronounce your curse upon him without delay, because it is a breach of justice to spare the wicked, just as it is to hurt the innocent.”

⁶ Then they both replied to the king and his venerable sage, saying, “What fools must you be to have wasted your curse, the great gain of your tapas, on our devoted heads. ⁷ The curse you have pronounced can do us very little harm. Though our bodies should fall, yet it cannot affect our inner minds and spirits. ⁸ The inner principle of the soul, owing to its inscrutable, subtle and intellectual nature, can never be destroyed by anybody anywhere.

⁹ The Sun added:—

Then this fascinated pair, head over heels in love, fell down by effect of the curse, just like when branches cut from a tree fall upon the ground. ¹⁰ Being subjected to the torment of reincarnation, they were both born as a pair of deer in mutual attachment, and then as a couple of turtle doves in their inseparable alliance. ¹¹ Afterwards, O lord of our creation, this loving pair came to be born as man and woman, who by their practice of austerities, came to be reborn at last as a brahmin and brahmani.

Chapter 91 — Brahma Wonders Whether to Create; Two Aspects to the Mind

My lord, therefore I say that the mind, like time, is indestructible by its nature, and the unavoidable curse of the sage could not alter its tenor. ² Therefore it is not right for you, O great Brahma, to destroy the ideal fabric of the air-drawn world of the sons of Indu. It is improper for great souls to put a check on others' fancies.

⁶ O lord who has made these creatures, remain firm in your place. See the infinite space spread before you, commensurate with the ample scope of your understanding, in the triple spheres of your consciousness and mind and the vast emptiness of space. ⁷ These threefold infinities of ethereal, mental and intellectual spaces, are only reflections of the infinite emptiness of Divine Consciousness. They supply you, O Brahma, with ample space to create as many worlds as you wish. ⁸ You are at liberty at your pleasure to create whatever you like. When you have the power to create everything, do not think that the sons of Indu have robbed you of anything.

⁹ Brahma said:—

After the Sun had spoken to me in this manner concerning men and other worlds, I reflected awhile and then answered him saying, ¹⁰ “Well have you said, O Sun, for I see the ample space of air lying open before me. I also see my spacious mind and the vast comprehension of my consciousness. Therefore I will go on with my work of creation forever. ¹¹ I will immediately think about multitudes of material productions. O Sun, I ordain you as my first offspring (Manu) to produce all these for me. ¹² Now produce all things as you will, and according to my command,” at which the brilliant sun readily complied to my request.

¹⁶ Thus have I related to you, O sagely Vasishtha, all about the nature and acts of the mind, and omnipotence of the great soul that infuses its might in the mind through its acts of creation and production. ¹⁷ Whatever reflection is represented in the mind manifests in a visible form and becomes compact and stands confessed before it. ¹⁸ Look at the extraordinary power of the mind that raised ordinary brahmin men to the rank of Brahma through their conception of it in themselves. ¹⁹ As the individual souls of the Aindavas were incorporated with Brahma through their intense thought of him within, so also have we attained to the level of Brahma.

²⁵ As the Aindavas were Brahmas in their minds, so my mind makes me a Brahma also. It is the mind that makes one such and such, according to the conception that he entertains of himself. ²⁶ It is only by a conceit of my mind that I think myself situated as a Brahma in this place. Otherwise all these material bodies are known to be as unreal, like the emptiness of the soul in which they abide.

³⁰ There is nothing such as real or unreal, nor is there any personality such as I or you or any other. Real and unreal are both alike, unless it is the conception that makes something appear as a reality which has otherwise no reality of itself. ³¹ Know the mind is both active and inert. It is vast owing to the vastness of its desires. It is lively on account of its spiritual nature of the great God. The mind becomes inert by its incorporation with material objects.

³² The conception of phenomena as real cannot make them real, any more than the appearance of a golden bracelet can make it gold, or the phenomena appearing in Brahma can identify themselves with Brahma himself. ³³ Brahma being all in all, the inert also are said to be intelligent, or else all beings from ourselves down to blocks are neither inert nor intelligent. ³⁴ It is said that lifeless blocks are without intelligence and perception, but everything that bears a like relation to another has its perception also like the other. ³⁵ Know that everything is sentient and has its perception or sensitivity. All things possess perception because of the relation between themselves and the Supreme Soul.

³⁷ Notion or thought formed by and an act of consciousness is called the mind. Of these, the intellect or intellectual part is the active principle, but the thought or mental part is quite inert. ³⁸ The intellectual part consists of the operation of exercise of consciousness, but the thoughts or that which is thought (chetvas), which are the acts of consciousness (chit) are known to be inert. These are viewed by the individual soul in the false light of the world.

⁴³ There is no error of egoism or personality in the transcendental category of the Divine Soul because it is the integrity of all consciousness, just as the sea is the collection of all its waves and waters.

⁴⁴ The belief of egoism rises like any other thought of the mind, and is as inborn in it as water in the mirage, which does not exist really in it. ⁴⁵ The term ego is inapplicable to the pure and simple internal soul which, being weakened by the gross idea of its ardent desire, takes the name of ego, just as thickened coldness is called by the name of frost. ⁴⁶ The pure substance of consciousness forms the ideas of gross bodies, just as one dreams of his death in his sleep. All-pervading consciousness, which is the all inherent and omnipotent soul, produces all forms in itself, of which there is no end until they are reduced to unity. ⁴⁷ The mind manifests various appearances in the forms of things, and being of a pure ethereal form, it assumes various shapes by its intellectual or spiritual body.

Chapter 92 — A Strong Mind Is Unaffected by Curses

Now hear, O support of Raghu's race, what I next asked of the lotus-born lord Brahma, after we had finished the preceding conversation.

² I asked him saying, “Lord, you have spoken before of the irrevocable power of curses. Then how is it that their power is frustrated by men?”

³ “We have witnessed the efficacy of curses, pronounced with potent mantra anathemas, to overpower the understanding and senses of living animals and paralyze every member of the body. ⁴ The mind and body are as intimately connected with each other as motion with air and fluidity with a sesame seed. ⁵ There is nobody except a creation of the mind, like the fantasies of visions and dreams, and like the false sight of water in the mirage, or the appearance of two moons in the sky. ⁶ Or else why is it that the dissolution of the one brings on the extinction of the other, such as the quiet of the mind is followed by the loss of bodily sensations?”

⁷ “Tell me, my lord, how is the mind unaffected by the power of curses and menace that subdue the senses? Are mind and senses both overpowered by curses, being the one and same thing?”

⁸ Brahma replied:—

Know there is nothing in the treasure-house of this world that man cannot attain by means of his efforts in the right way.

⁹ All species of animal beings, from the state of the highest Brahma down to minute insects, are bicorporal. They are endowed with two bodies: mental and physical. ¹⁰ The mental body is ever active and always fickle. The other is the worthless body of flesh, which is dull and inactive. ¹¹ The fleshy part of the body that accompanies all animal beings is overpowered by the influence of curses and charms practiced by the art of incantation (abhichara vidya). ¹² The influence of certain supernatural powers stupefies a man, making him dull and dumb. Sometimes one is about to droop down unconscious, as spell-bound persons are deprived of their external senses, and fall down like a drop of water from a lotus-leaf. ¹³ The mind, which is the other part of the body of embodied beings, is ever free and not subdued, though it is always under the subjection of all living beings in the three worlds.

¹⁷ Focusing the mind in an effort to hurt objects unconnected with matter is as vain as trying to pierce a stone with an arrow. ¹⁸ Drown the body underwater or dip it in mud, burn it in fire or fling it aloft in the air, yet the mind turns not from its orientation. He who is true to his purpose is sure of success.

¹⁹ Intensity of physical efforts overcomes all impediments, but only mental effort leads to ultimate success in every undertaking.

Chapter 93 — Brahma as the Mind: A View of the Genesis of the Mind & Body

Rama, I will now tell you what lord Brahma himself taught me long ago.

² From the unspeakable Brahma, there sprang all things in their indefinable ideal state. Then the Spirit of God, being condensed by His Will, came to be produced of itself in the form of the Mind. ³ The Mind formed the notions of the subtle elementary principles in itself and became a personal agent. It became a luminous body and was known as Brahma the first Male (purusha). ⁴ Therefore Rama, know this same Brahma is situated in the Supreme (parameshthi) and, being a personification of the Will of God, is called the Mind.

¹⁷ Thousands of individual souls are falling off as quickly as the leaves of forest trees. Carried away by the force of their pursuits, they are rolling about like fallen leaves blown upward by the breeze in the valleys. ¹⁸ Many are brought down by their ignorance of Divine Consciousness (chit) and are bound to innumerable births on this earth, subject to unending reincarnations in various births. ¹⁹ There are some who, having passed many mean births in this earth, have risen high in the scale of beings by their tapas to better acts. ²⁰ Some persons acquainted with spirituality have reached their state of perfection and have gone to heaven, like particles of seawater carried into the air by blowing

²² Our desires are poisonous plants bearing the fruits of pain and disappointment. They lead us to actions filled with dangers and difficulties. ²³ These desires drive us to different countries and to distant hills and valleys in search of gain. ²⁴ This world, O Rama, is a jungle of withered trees and brambles. It requires the axe of reason to clear away these trees and bushes. So our minds and bodies are only plants and trees of our sorrow which, when rooted out by the axe of reason, will grow no more as reincarnations on this earth.

Chapter 94 — Fourteen Grades of Beings; Brahma the Origin of All

Now hear me relate to you, Rama, the several classes of higher, lower and middling species of beings, and the various grades of their existence here and elsewhere in the scale of creation.

² The first class in birth (idam-prathama) were the first to be produced. They are those whose long practice in a course of virtuous actions in prior states has secured to them the property of only goodness.

⁷ The fifth grade is composed of men of a baser nature, called adhama-satwa by the wise, and who may possibly have their liberation after a course of numberless births in different shapes and forms.

⁹ Those who pass two or three previous births in other states and are then born with the quality of gentleness are in the seventh grade, called the gentry (rajashi). ¹⁰ The wise say that those who remain mindful of their duties and are employed in discharge of them in this state of life are entitled to their liberation soon after their death.

¹⁸ Then comes the thirteenth order of those in darkest darkness (tamas-tamasi) who have to reincarnate for millions of years, both in their prior and later births, before they can have their liberation from the bondage of body.

²⁴ As the variegated tree produces its leaves and flowers of various colors from itself, so the varieties of created beings spring from one Brahma, the source of all. ²⁵ As gold ornaments relate to the metal gold of which they are made and wherein they exist, so all things and persons are in relation to Brahma, out of whom they have sprung and in whom they abide. ²⁶ As drops of water are related to the pure water of the waterfall, so Rama are all things related to the uncreated Brahma from which they issue as like drops. ²⁷ As the air in a pot or about a basin is the same as the air that surrounds heaven, so all individual objects are the same with the undivided spirit of the all-pervading Brahma.

Chapter 95 — Identity of Mind & Action

There is no difference between acts and agent. They have sprung together from the same source of their creator. They are the simultaneous growth of nature like flowers and their fragrance.

² When human souls are freed from their desires, they are united with the Supreme Soul of Brahma, just like the blueness of the sky, which appears distinct to the eyes of the ignorant, is found to be joined with the clear firmament.

⁷ It has been explained that the concrete world springs from the discrete Brahma because the production of something is the same as its material cause, though it seems different from it to common understanding. ⁸ Multitudes of living beings, rising like the rocks of Meru and Mandara Mountains, are joined with the main range from which they jut out. ⁹ Thousands and thousands of living beings are constantly produced from their common source, like the innumerable offshoots of forest trees filling the woodland sky with their variegated foliage. ¹⁰ An infinity of living beings will continue to spring from Brahma, like blades of grass sprouting from the earth below. They will likewise be reduced to Brahma, like the seasonal plants of spring that die in the hot weather of summer. ¹¹ There is no counting the living creatures that exist at anytime, and what numbers are being born and are dying at any moment.

¹⁹ “Again sage, both men and the Vedas agree that acts and their actors come one after the other, and not as you said both arising simultaneously from their divine origin. ²⁰ Act makes the actor, and the actor does the work. Thus they follow one another like the seed and tree which produce one another. This mutuality of both is seen in the practice of men and ordinances of the Vedas. ²¹ Acts are the causes of animal births, as the seed gives birth to the sprouts of plants. In turn, works proceed from living beings like the sprouts produce the seeds. ²² The desire that prompts a person to his particular pursuit in his prison house of this world, the same yields him like fruits and no other.”

²⁷ “Therefore sage, please tell me about the nature of acts, for you are best acquainted with the secrets of things and can well answer my questions on the subject.”

²⁸ Vasishta replied:—

My good Rama, you have asked well about this intricate subject. I will now explain to you in a manner that will enlighten your understanding.

²⁹ It is the activity of the mind that forms its thoughts and intentions and which are the roots or seed of actions. It is its passivity that is the recipient of their results. ³⁰ Therefore no sooner did the principle of the mind spring from the essence of Brahma than it was accompanied by its thoughts and actions in the bodies which the living beings assumed according to their prior deserts and inborn desires. ³¹ As there is no difference between the flower and its fragrance, there is no distinction between the mind and its actions, which are one and the same thing.

³² The exertion of bodily activity is called an action, but the wise well know that action is preceded by a mental action which is called its thought in the mind. ³³ It is possible to deny the existence of material objects like air, water, hill and others, but it is impossible to deny the operations of our mental faculties, of which we have subjective evidence in ourselves. ³⁴ No deliberate action of the present or past life goes for nothing. All human actions and efforts are attended with their just results, to which they are properly directed.

³⁵ As ink ceases to be ink without its inky blackness, so the mind ceases to exist without the action of its mental operations. ³⁶ Cessation of mental activity is attended with cessation of thought, and stillness of the mind is accompanied with a cessation of actions. The liberated are free from both of these, but those who are not liberated from neither. ³⁷ The mind is ever united with its activity as fire with its heat, and the lack of either mind or action means the extinction of both. ³⁸ The mind, ever restless in itself, becomes identified with the actions proceeding from its activity. In turn, the actions, whether good or bad, become identified with the mind which feels their just rewards and punishments.

Hence Rama, you see the inseparable connection between mind and acts. They reciprocate their actions and reactions upon each other.

Chapter 96 — Different Names for Mind

The mind is mere thought, and thought is the mind in motion. Its actions are directed by the nature of the thoughts, and the result of the acts is felt by everybody in his mind.

² Rama said, “Sage, please explain in more detail the immaterial mind as opposed to the material body, and its inseparable property of will or volition.”

³ Vasishta replied:—

The nature of the mind is known to be composed of the property of will, which is an attribute of the infinite and almighty power of the Supreme Soul. ⁴ The mind is known to be of the form of that self-moving principle which determines men’s doubt between the affirmative and negative sides (as whether it is so or not). ⁵ The mind is known to be of the form of ego, which is ignorant of the self-manifesting soul of God and believes itself to be the subject of its thoughts and actions. ⁶ The mind is of the nature of imagination (kalpana) which is always busy in its operations. Therefore the inactivity of the mind is as impossible in this world as it is for an intelligent man not to think.

⁷ As there is no difference in the essence of fire and heat, so there is no difference whatever between mind and its activity, and so between the mind and soul.

⁸ The mind is known by many names according to its various faculties and functions, its various thoughts and desires, and their manifold operations and consequences. ⁹ The Divine Mind is said to be distributed into all souls by mistake and without any reason, because the All is without any substance or substratum and is indivisible in its nature. It is a mere fabrication of our desires and fancies to diversify it in different persons. ¹⁰ Whoever has set his desire in anything as if it were a reality, finds the same to be attended with the like fruit as he had expected of it. ¹¹ It is the movement of the mind that is said and perceived by us to be the source of our actions, and the actions of the mind are as various as the branches, leaves and fruits of trees.

¹³ Mind, understanding, egoism, intellect, consciousness, action and imagination, together with memory, desire, ignorance, and effort are all synonyms of the mind. ¹⁴ Sensation, nature, delusion and actions are also words applied to the mind to bewilder one’s understanding. ¹⁵ The simultaneous collision of many sensations diverts the mind from its clear sight of the object of its thought, and causes it to turn about in many ways.

¹⁶ Rama asked, “How is it sage, that so many words with different meanings were invented to express the transcendent cause of our consciousness (the mind), and heap them on the same thing solely for our confusion?”

¹⁷ Vasishta replied:—

As man began to lose sight of his consciousness and labored under suppositions about his self, he found the mind to be the waking principle within him. ¹⁸ When man, after considering himself and other things, comes to understand them in their true light, he is then said to have his understanding (buddhi).¹⁹ When man by false conception of himself assumes a personality by his pride, he is called an egoist, with the principle of ego or egoism causing his bondage on earth. Absolute egoism is doubting everything other than individual self-existence.

²² The mind is said to be fanciful because it holds onto fleeting fantasies and ignores its solid and certain truths. It is also called imagination because it presents various images of the objects of its desire (ihita kalpana). It is called kakataliya sanyoga or accidental assemblage of fancied objects. It is defined as the agglutinative and associative power that accumulates materials for imagination.

²⁵ When the mind's clear sight of the light of the soul or self is hidden by the shadow of other gross things which appear to be real instead of the true spiritual, it is called ignorance. It is another name for deluded understanding. ²⁶ The next is doubt, which entraps the dubious mind in the snare of skepticism and tends to destroy the soul by causing it to disbelieve and forget the Supreme Spirit.

²⁷ The mind is called sensation because all its actions of hearing, feeling, seeing, smelling, thinking and enjoying serve to delight the senses which convey the impressions back to the mind. ²⁸ The mind that views all phenomena of nature in the Supreme Spirit and takes outward nature as a copy of the eternal mind of God, is called nature itself.

²⁹ The mind is called maya or magic because it converts the real into unreal, and the unreal into real. Showing realities as unrealities and the vice-versa by turns, the mind is called error or mistake of our judgment, giving assent to what is untrue and its contrary. The causes of error are said to be ignorance (avidya) and passions (tamas). ³⁰ The actions of the physical organs of senses are seeing, hearing, feeling, tasting and smelling, but the mind is the cause of both actions and their acts.

³⁶ Rama said, “O sir, you are acquainted with all truths. Please tell me whether the mind is a material or immaterial thing. So far I have been unable to determine this.”

³⁷ Vasishta replied:—

The mind, O Rama, is not completely a gross substance or completely an intelligent principle. Originally it is as intelligent as consciousness, but being sullied by the evils of the world and the passions and desires of the body, it takes the name of the mind. ³⁸ Consciousness (chit), which is the cause of the world, is called heart (chitta) when it is situated in the bosom of sentient bodies with all its affections and feelings (avilam). Then it has a nature between goodness and badness.

⁴⁵ Besides the names that I have already mentioned for the mind, the disputants in mental philosophy have invented many others agreeably to their diverse theories. ⁴⁶ They have attributed many names to the mind according to the views in which they want to exhibit its nature, such as calling it intellect, understanding or sensation and so forth. ⁴⁷ One takes it as dull matter and another as the living principle. Someone calls it ego, while others apply the term understanding.

⁴⁸ Rama, I have told you that individual ego, mind, the light of understanding, and the will to create are only different properties of the one and same internal principle. ⁴⁹ Nyaya philosophy has taken the mind in different lights according to its own view of them. The Sankhya system explains perception and senses in a way peculiar to itself. ⁵⁰ In this manner, all these terms are taken in very different meanings by the different systems of Mimamsa, Vaiseshika, Arhata and Buddhist philosophy. The Pancharatra and some other systems have given them particular meanings inconsistent with one another. ⁵¹ All these various doctrines, arising at different times and in distant countries, lead at last to the same Supreme Being, like the very many different ways leading their passengers to the same imperial city. ⁵² Ignorance of this supreme truth and misunderstanding among conflicting doctrines cause the adherents of different systems and sects to carry on endless and bitterly acrimonious disputes among themselves. ⁵³ The disputants maintain their particular positions by their respective dogmatism, just like passengers persist in their accustomed paths as the best suited to them.

⁵⁴ It is wrong to say that everything is the fruit of our acts, and therefore mankind should only be concerned about the performance of their actions. According to men’s various perspectives, they have come up with their explanations in their own ways.

⁶⁰ Whoever thinks the mind is a dull material substance, or whose gross understanding cannot understand the nature of consciousness, is the dullest of beings. ⁶¹ The mind is neither intelligence (chetana) nor inert matter (jada). It is individual ego that has sprung amidst the various joys and griefs in this world. ⁶² The mind that is one with Divine Consciousness perceives the world as absorbed into itself. But the mind polluted with matter falls into the error of taking the world for real.

⁶³ Know Rama, that neither the pure immaterial intellect nor matter as gross as inert stone can be the cause of the material world. ⁶⁴ Know then, O Raghava, that neither intelligence nor inertia is the cause of the world. The mind is the cause of visible objects, just as the mind is the light which unfolds them to view. ⁶⁵ Where there is no mind, there is no perception of the outer world. Dull matter does not know of the existence of anything. Everything is extinct with the extinction of the mind.

⁶⁷ If ego is not recognized as a mental action, and if sensations are reckoned as actions of the body, then the name “living principle” still applies to all acts of the body and mind. ⁶⁸ Whatever names or qualities of the mind are mentioned in the reasoning of different systems of philosophy, and sometimes by the advocates of an opinion, and at other times by their adversaries, ⁶⁹ they are neither intelligible nor distinguishable from one another. They are all powers of the same mind which, like the flowing sea, pours its waters into innumerable outlets.

⁷⁰ As soon as men begin to attribute materialistic powers and force to the nature of pure consciousness, they fall into the error of these varieties of their own making. ⁷¹ As a spider lets out its thread from itself, in the same manner the inert has sprung from consciousness and matter has come into existence from the ever active spirit of Brahma. ⁷² Ignorance has introduced various opinions concerning the essence of the mind. From this arose the various different expressions among opponents, all of which have the same meaning, Consciousness.

⁷³ The same pure Consciousness is labeled the mind, understanding, living principle and egoism. The same is expressed by the words intelligence, heart, animation and many other synonyms which, being taken as meaning the same thing, should put an end to all dispute.

Chapter 97 — Three Spheres: Pure Consciousness, Mental & Physical

² Vasishta answered:—

As already said, the Mind having assumed a substantial form manifested itself like water in a mirage raised by the shining blaze of its own light. ³ The mind within the Spirit of Brahma became one with the contents of the world, now showing itself in the form of man, and now appearing as a god.

⁷ It was this mind that spread out the world with all its contents. Other than the mind, there exists nothing but the Supreme Spirit. ⁸ The soul is beyond every category. It is omnipresent and the substratum of all existence. It is by the power of this soul that the mind moves and manifests itself.

⁹ The mind is known as the cause of the body. The body is work of the mind. The mind is born and becomes extinct with the body, which the soul does not. The soul has no quality that belongs to the mind. ¹⁰ By right reasoning, the mind is found to be a perishable object. When the mind perishes, the individual soul attains final liberation. The desires of the mind are the bondage of its reincarnation, but the dissolution of the mind and its desires secures its liberation. ¹¹ After mental desires cease there is no more exertion for acts. This state is called liberation of individual souls from trouble and care. The mind thus released, never comes to be born and die again.

¹² Rama said, “Sage, you have said before that human nature is principally of three kinds: the good, the gentle and the base (satva, rajas and tamas), and it is owing to the good or bad nature of their minds that men differ from one another. ¹³ Now please tell me, how could the wonderful mind with its good or bad propensities that are lacking in Divine Consciousness originate from pure Consciousness?”

¹⁴ Vasishta replied:—

Rama, know that there are three spheres of infinite emptiness that are at immense distances from one another. These are the intellectual, mental and physical spheres. ¹⁵ These environments are common to all mankind and they are spread out everywhere. They have all sprung and come to being from the essence of Divine Consciousness (chit).

¹⁷ Space is called the sphere of Consciousness which embraces all space and time and which has spread out the other spheres or environments. Consciousness is the highest and best of all.

¹⁸ The physical sphere (bhutakasha, element-space) contains all created beings and extends to all ten directions about, above and below us. It is a space filled with air that supports the clouds and waters above the sky. ¹⁹ Then the emptiness of the mental sphere (chittakasha, mind-space), which has also sprung from the sphere of consciousness (chidakasha, consciousness-space), likewise has consciousness for its cause like the others, as the day is the source of all works and animal activities.

²¹ I have made use of the metaphor of spheres for the understanding of the unenlightened. Figures are used to instruct the unenlightened and not to lighten the enlightened. ²² In the consciousness sphere, you will see one Supreme Brahma filling its whole space, without parts or attributes, and intelligible only to the enlightened. ²³ The ignorant need to be instructed with appropriate words and precise language showing the distinction between monotheism and belief in two gods, which is unnecessary for the instruction of the enlightened. ²⁴ I have contrived to explain to you the nature of divine knowledge, by the parable of the three spheres, which will enlighten you as long as you are in dark on the subject.

²⁵ The consciousness sphere is hidden by ignorance, so we are led to look into the mental and physical spheres. They are as delusive as sunbeams in a mirage, and as destructive as the flames of fire.

Chapter 98 — Story of the Origin of the Heart; Deluded Men Punishing Themselves in the Desert

⁴ On this subject there hangs a curious tale relating the legend of the heart. Brahma himself told me the story a long ago, which I will now share it with you, Rama, if you will listen with attention.

¹⁹ I saw him going on in this way for a long time, then with all my force, I rushed forward and stopped him. ²⁰ I asked, "Who are you, sage, and why do you act in this manner? What business have you in this place, and why do you wail and trouble yourself for nothing?"

²¹ O Rama, he answered me saying, "I am nobody, O sage! Nor am I doing any such thing as you are saying. ²² You have stricken me here and you are my greatest enemy. You have seen me here and you persecute me, both to my great sorrow and delight." ²³ Saying so, he looked sorrowfully at his bruised body and limbs, then cried aloud and wept a flood of tears that fell like a shower of rain on the forest ground. ²⁴ After a short while he ceased weeping, then looking at his limbs, he laughed and cried aloud in his joy. ²⁵ After his laughter and loud shouts were over, hear, O Rama, what the man next did before me.

He began to tear off and separate the members of his big body, and cast them away on all sides. ²⁶ He first let his big head fall, then his arms, and afterwards his breast and his belly also. ²⁷ Thus the man, having cut off the parts of his body one after another, was now ready to remove himself elsewhere with only his legs, by the decree of his destiny.

³⁴ I saw yet another following him on the same desert path. He also had been flying and torturing himself in the same way as the others before him. ³⁵ He fell into the same dark pit in his flight. I stood there for some time watching his sad and fearful plight. ³⁶ Finding after a long time that this wretched man was not climbing out of the pit, I advanced to help him up when I saw another man following his footsteps. ³⁷ Seeing him to be of the same form and hastening to his impending fall in the doleful pit, I ran to stop him with the same question I had asked the others before. ³⁸ But, O lotus-eyed Rama, the man paid no heed to my question and only said, "You must be a fool to know nothing of me. ³⁹ You wicked brahmin!" he said to me, then went on in his course. I kept wandering in that dreadful desert in my own way.

⁴⁴ This vast desert still exists, together with these sorts of men in it. That place is well known to you, Rama, as the common range of mankind. Do you remember it now, with all the culture of your mind from your early youth? ⁴⁵ O that dreadful desert is this world, filled with thorns and dangers on all sides. It is a dark desert amid a thick spread darkness. Nobody who comes here finds peace and quiet in his heart except those who have acquired divine knowledge, which makes it a rose garden to them.

Chapter 99 — Heart Origin: Deluded Men in the Desert Explained

¹ Rama said, “What is that great desert, sage? When did I see it and how did I come to know it? Who were those men and what were they doing?”

² Vasishta replied:—

Attend O great-armed Rama, and I will tell you all. That great desert is not distant or different from this wilderness of the world. ³ That which bears the name of the world is a deep and dark abyss in itself. Its hollowness is unfathomable and impassable. Its unreality appears as reality to the ignorant, and it is the great desert spoken of before.

⁹ But there were others who paid no attention to my lectures because of their great ignorance. They fell down into the pit after I scolded them with reproofs and rebukes. ¹⁰ Those deep and dark pits were no other than the pits of hell. The plantain groves that I described were the Nandana gardens of paradise. ¹¹ These gardens are the place of those minds that long for heavenly joys. The dark pits are the homes of hellish hearts that can never get their release from those dark dungeons. ¹² Those who, having once entered the plantain grove and never come out, are the minds of the virtuous filled with all their virtues.

²⁵ The minds that had some light of reason, but had not yet arrived to divine knowledge, were still sorrowing for having to leave behind their own bodies where they had their previous life. ²⁶ Those who smiled in the cheerfulness of their hearts were men who had come to the light of reason, and it was their reason that gave consolation to their hearts. ²⁷ The reasonable soul, removed from its bondage of the world, exults with joy to find itself liberated from the cares of life. ²⁸ Those men who laughed to scorn their battered and shattered bodies were happy to think about how they had rid themselves of the confines of their bodies and limbs, the accomplices of their actions. ²⁹ Those who laughed with scorn to see their falling body parts were happy to think in their minds that they were no better than instruments to their various labors in the world.

³⁰ Those who had come to the light of reason and had found their rest in the supreme state of joy, from a distance looked down with scorn upon the former homes of their meanness. ³¹ The man I stopped who asked with concern (about what he was going to do) was made to understand how the power of wisdom could endure the desperate. ³² The weakened limbs that gradually disappeared from sight meant the subjection of the members of the body to the control of the mind that is freed from its corruption by riches.

⁴² No flight can release the mind unless it is practiced to resignation, restrained from its other pursuits, and constrained to the continued practice of pious meditation, which only can relieve its sorrows.⁴³ The mind's misjudgments cause accumulated sorrows that increase in height like the peak of a mount. It is the government of the mind that melts our sorrows, like hoarfrost under sunbeams.

⁴⁴ Throughout your lifetime, accustom your mind to the righteous ways pointed out by the scriptures. Restrain your appetites, govern your passions, and observe the silence of holy saints and sages. At last you will arrive at the holy state of holies and rest under the cooling shade of holiness. You shall no more have to grieve under the disasters that happen to all mankind.

Chapter 100 — Healing the Heart: All within God; No Bondage or Liberation

I have told you how the mind originates from the essence of the Supreme Being. It is of the same kind, and yet not the same with its source, but like the waves and waters of the sea. ² The minds of the enlightened are not different from the Divine Mind because those who have knowledge of the community of waters do not regard the waves as different from the waters of the sea. ³ The minds of the unenlightened are the causes of their error, because those not knowing the common property of water find a difference between waves and the sea.

⁴ For the instruction of the unlearned, it is necessary to teach them about the relationship between significant words and their meanings.

¹¹ Everything is situated in Brahman, just as the tree is contained in the seed of the same kind and afterwards develops in its roots, sprouts, leaves and branches, and finally its flowers and fruit. ¹² The power called the living principle is a reflection of God. It has a nature between the thinking mind and dull matter, and it is derived from Brahman. ¹³ The nature of God is unchangeable, although it is usual to attribute many varieties to him, just like we call the same vegetable by different names at its different stages of growth, like a germ, a sprout, a shrub, a plant and a tree.

¹⁷ Thus the mind, being only the thinking power of Brahman, receives the name of Brahma. This power appearing as a part of the impersonal Brahman is identified with Ego (the personal Brahma).

¹⁸ It is our error to differ between the soul and mind, and Brahman and Brahma, because the properties that belong to the mind are the same as those of the self-existent Soul. ¹⁹ That which is variously named the principle of mind or thought is the same power of omnipotence that is settled in the mind. ²⁰ So all the properties of the individual soul are contained in and derive from the Universal

Soul of Brahma, just like all the properties of vegetation, blossoming and fructification of trees are contained in the season of spring and are dispensed among plants agreeably to their respective soil, climate and other environments.

²¹ As the earth yields its various fruits and flowers in their season, so the hearts and minds of men entertain their thoughts and passions in their proper times. Some appearing at one time and others at another. ²² As the earth produces its harvests according to their particular soil and season, so the heart and mind exhibit their thoughts and feelings of their own accord, and not caused by another.

³¹ There is no craving or pleasure, or any desire or error in he who rests his dependence in the Supreme. How can one have any desire or error in himself who lives in the Supreme Self that is devoid of them? ³² Everything is a form of the Supreme Soul. All things are only forms of the Supreme Soul. The mind also is a form of it, just like a golden ornament is only a form of the gold.

³³ The mind that is ignorant of its Supreme Origin is called the individual soul. Its ignorance of the Supreme Soul resembles a friend who has alienated himself from his true friend. ³⁴ The mind misled by its ignorance of the all-intelligent God imagines its own personality to be a reality. It is like one who believes his individual soul to be produced from nothing. ³⁵ The individual soul, although it is a particle of the Supreme Soul, shows itself in this world as no soul at all (but a form of mere physical vitality). So the weak in understanding see two moons in the sky and are unable to distinguish the true moon from the false one.

³⁶ Because the soul is the only real entity, it is improper to speak of its bondage and liberation. The imputation of error to the soul is quite absurd in the sight of lexicographers, who define it as infallible. ³⁷ It is a wrong impression to speak of the bondage of the soul which is ever free from bonds. It is untrue to seek the emancipation of the soul which is always emancipate.

³⁸ Rama asked, “Sometimes the mind is certain, then it becomes uncertain. How then do you say that the mind is not under the bondage of error?”

³⁹ Vasishtha answered:—

It is a false conceit of the ignorant to imagine its bondage. Emancipation is their imagination, an equally false conception.

⁴³ At first the mind, then its bondage and liberation, and afterwards its creation of the unsubstantial material world, are all only fabulous inventions that have come into vogue among men, as the story of the boy of old.

Chapter 101 — An Old Nurse Makes up a Story of Three Princes for a Boy

¹ Rama said, “Tell me, O chief of sages, the story of the boy that illustrates the Mind.”

² Vasishta replied:—

Hear me Rama, tell you the tale of a silly and stupid boy who once asked his nurse to recite some pretty story for his amusement. ³ With a pleased face and with an accent sweet as honey, the nurse began to relate her fine wrought story for the pleasure of the boy.

⁴ Once upon a time in a desolate country, there were three high minded and fortunate young princes noted for their virtues and valor. ⁵ They shone in that vast desolate land resembling the spacious sky, like stars reflected in the expanse of waters below. Two of them were un-begotten and uncreated, and the third was not born of a mother’s womb.

¹⁹ They resumed their journey and at the end of the day, about sunset, they arrived at their future home, a newly built city standing far away on the height of a hill. ²⁰ There were rows of flags fluttering like lotuses in the clear lake of the blue sky. The loud noise of the songs of the citizens was heard at a distance. ²¹ Here they saw three beautiful and good looking houses with turrets of gold and gems shining afar, like the peaks of Mount Meru under the blazing sun. ²² Two of these were not the works of art, and the third was without foundation. At last the three princes entered the last of these.

²⁶ The princes then invited three brahmins (childhood, youth and age) to the food prepared by them, two of whom (childhood and youth) were bodiless and the third (old age) had no mouth with which to eat. ²⁷ The mouth-less brahmin took a hundred bushels of the rice and ate it up because he had devoured the child and the youth. The princes took the remainder of the brahmin's food for their meal (which was nothing). ²⁸ The three princes having refreshed themselves with the traces of the brahmin's food, took their rest in the same house of their next home, then went out on their journey to hunt for new homes (or repeated reincarnations).

²⁹ Thus I have related to you, O Rama, the entire story of the boy and princes. Now consider its significance well in your mind and you will become wise thereby. ³⁰ After the nurse finished telling her pretty parable, the boy seemed happy with what he had heard. ³¹ I have told you this story, O Rama, in connection with my lecture on the subject of the mind. The story serves to explain how the mind fabricates this imaginary being of the world.

³² This air-built castle of the world which has come to be taken for a reality is like the story of the body, only a false fabrication from the old nurse's imagination. ³³ It is the representation of the various thoughts and ideas of our minds that exhibit themselves to view according to our notions of them in our states of bondage and liberation. ³⁴ Nothing really exists except the creations of our imagination. It is our fancy that fashions all the objects in their peculiar fantastic forms. ³⁵ The heavens, earth, sky and air, and also the rivers, mountains and the sides and quarters of the sky, are all creations of our fancy, like the visions in our dreams that join and disjoin and fashion scenes in their fantastic forms.

³⁹ Know from here on, O Rama, that the whole universe is the network of imagination, and your imagination is the most active power of the mind. Therefore repress the thickening phantoms of your fleeting fancy and obtain your tranquility by relying solely upon the certainty of the immutable Soul of souls.

Chapter 102 — On the Indivisibility and Immortality of the Soul

The ignorant are subject to errors caused by their false fancies, from which the wise are entirely free. By imagining and attributing perishable properties to the imperishable soul, the ignorant beguile themselves like children who take their dolls to be men.

² Rama replied, “What is this imagined perishable property that is imputed to the imperishable soul? Tell me also, O greatest of theologians, what misrepresentation misleads the mind to the false conception of the unreal world for a reality?”

The soul, by its continued association with unreal and perishable things, thinks itself to be one of them and takes the title of an unreal and perishable ego, just like a boy by association of his thoughts imagines a false apparition to be a real ghost.

⁴ All things being situated in one absolute reality, it is hard to account for one’s personal ego and to say how and from where this conception became established. ⁵ In fact, there is no ego except that of the Supreme Soul. Yet is the nature of the unwise to make a difference between a finite ego and infinite Ego, and between a mortal and immortal soul, as if we see two streams of water in the sunbeams of a hot, sandy desert.

⁹ Why do you think that the unconfined soul is confined in the body? It is vain to suppose the infinite soul is confined in any place. ¹⁰ To suppose one to be many is to make a division and create a variety in the nature of the Supreme Spirit. Again, the Divine Essence being diffused alike in all, it cannot be said to be confined in one thing and absent in another.

¹¹ The body being hurt, the soul is supposed to be hurt likewise, but no pain or hurt or sickness of any kind can affect the unchanging soul. ¹² The body being hurt or weakened or destroyed, there is no injury done to the soul, just like a blacksmith’s bellows being burned, the wind with which it was filled escapes unconsumed. ¹³ Whether the body lasts or falls is of no matter to us, like a flower being destroyed deposits its fragrance in the air. ¹⁴ Let any pain or pleasure befall on the body, like dewdrops falling on lotus leaves. It cannot affect us any more than a fading lotus affects or afflicts a flying bee in any manner. ¹⁵ Let the body rise or fall or fly in smoke and mix with the air. These changing forms can have no effect whatsoever on the soul.

¹⁶ The connection of the body with the soul is like that between the cloud and the wind, and between the lotus and the bee. ¹⁷ If the mind that forms a part of all living bodies is not affected by physical pain, then how is it possible that the primary power of consciousness that resides in the soul can be subject to death? ¹⁸ If you know, O wise Rama, that the soul is indestructible and inseparable, then what is the need to have sorrow for the supposed separation or disappearance of the all pervading spirit?

²⁴ The minds and bodies of living beings are apt to disappear at times from where they live and hide under the shroud of death. Why should we sorrow for such renegades? ²⁵ Seeing the death and disappearance of others, no fool learns to think for himself but fears to die like all ignorant fools. ²⁶ Therefore renounce, O Rama, your selfish desires and know the falsity of ego. Give up the bond of the body and fly upward, like a new fledged bird leaves its nest and flies above.

land and quickly drives us into all sorts of dangers and difficulties.

Valmiki speaking:—

⁴¹ As the sage ended his sermon, the day departed to its end and the sun declined to the west to his evening service. The assembly broke after mutual salutations and met again and greeted each other with the parting night and rising sun.

Chapter 103 — The Changing Mind

Vasishta speaking:—

³ The mind by its thought makes a mountain of a particle, then thinks itself a lord with its little trifle.

⁹ Hence it is the mind that reaps the rewards of good or evil according to its past acts, just like the tree bears its fruit according to how it is pruned and watered.

¹⁰ As a child makes a variety of toy dolls from clay, so the mind is the maker of all its good and bad according to the merit or demerit of its past actions. ¹¹ Therefore the mind that is situated in the earthen dolls of human bodies can do nothing of its own will unless it is so destined by virtue of its former acts.

¹² As the seasons cause changes in trees, so the mind makes differences in the dispositions of living beings. ¹³ The mind indulges in its sport of deeming an inch a mile, and vice-versa of thinking something long as short, like the operations of our dreams and fancy. ¹⁴ A kalpa age is shortened to a moment and a moment is stretched into a kalpa by the different modes of the mind that regulate both the duration of time and the distance between places. ¹⁵ The perceptions of the quickness and slowness of motion, and of much or little in quantity, and also of swiftness or slowness of time, belong to the mind and not to the dull material body. ¹⁶ The feelings of sickness and error, sorrow and danger, and the passing of time and distance of place all rise in the mind like the leaves and branches of trees.

¹⁷ The mind is the cause of all its feelings, just as water is the cause of the sea and heat of fire. Hence the mind is the source of all things. It is intimately connected with whatever exists in the world. ¹⁸ The thoughts that we have of agent, effect and instrument of things, and also of the viewer, view and the instrumentality of sight, all belong to the mind. ¹⁹ The mind alone is perceived to be in existence in the world, and its representations of forests and all other things are but variations of itself!

So the thinking man sees only the substance of gold, and all its various forms of bangles and bracelets are taken for nothing.

Rama, hear me relate a very pretty story about the world as an enchanted city stretched out by magic of the magician Mind.

² There lies on the surface of this earth a large and populous tract of land by name of Northern Pandava, a country full of forests of various kinds. ³ The forests were deep and dense, and a number of holy hermits live in the fastness of these woods. Vidyadhara maidens had constructed many dwellings of swinging vines. ⁴ The breeze blew up heaps of red dust from full blown lotuses, rising as high as crimson hills on the ground decorated with wreaths and garlands from loads of flowers fallen from surrounding trees. ⁵ Groves of karanja plants were decorated with bundles of blossoms to the farthest boundaries of the jungle, and the sky resounded with the rustling noise of leafy date trees in the surrounding villages. ⁶ There was a range of tawny rocks on one side, and fields brown with ripened grain on another; while the warbling of cerulean doves echoed in the resonant groves.

listeners with the music of lutes. ²³ Then a set of handsome maids waved the beautiful fans that they held in their hands over the body of the king. Ministers and counselors, as wise as the teachers of the gods and demons (Brihaspati and Shukra), took their seats beside him. ²⁴ Ministers engaged in the public affairs pending before them, and capable officers reported to the king on the conditions of the county. ²⁵ There were learned pundits reciting holy legends from their books, and courteous eulogists chanting their sacred praises on one side.

remained as still as moonbeams at night. ⁴⁶ Courtiers remained motionless at seeing his stillness, as when the filaments of the lotus remain unmoved when smeared in the mud. ⁴⁷ The noise of people in the courtyard became hushed and quiet, like the roaring of the clouds stops at the end of the rains.

Chapter 105 — The Magic Spell on King Lavana Is Broken

After a couple of hours the king returned to his senses, like the lotus flower resuming its beauty after the mists of the rainy weather are over. ² He shook his body decorated with ornaments upon his saddle, like a mountain shakes with its peaks and woods at an earthquake. ³ His seat also shook under him as he came to his senses and moved his body, just like the seat of Shiva on Kailash Mountain is shaken by the movement of the world-supporting elephant.

⁶ The king softly asked them, “Where am I and whose court is this?” He was like a bee shut up in the flower cup of the lotus and about to sink in the water saying, “Ah! Where am I, and where am I going?” ⁷ The courtiers, with a voice as sweet as the lotus uttering to the sun when he is eclipsed by Rahu, respectfully asked the king what was the matter with him. ⁸ The attendants and all the ministerial officers asked him what had happened, like the gods, terrified at the great flood, asked sage Markandeya about what had happened.

⁹ “Lord, we were greatly dismayed,” said they, “upon seeing you in that plight, because the stoutest hearts are broken by accidents proceeding from unknown causes. ¹⁰ What were those pleasant objects of your desire that had so bewitched your mind? You know that all objects that appear pleasant for the present prove to be bitter at the end. ¹¹ How could your clear understanding, which has been pacified by the grand doctrines and precepts of the wise, fall in to the false fascinations of the foolish? ¹² The minds of fools are fascinated by the trivial and cheap trifles of common people, but they are of no value to the high minded as one like yourself.”

²⁰ He saw the magician and said to him with a smile, as the serpent Takshaka addresses his enemy, the weasel. ²¹ “You trickster,” said the king. “What was this snare that you used to trap me? How did you disturb my tranquil soul by your wily trick, like a gale disturbs the calm of the sea?"

²⁵ "Hear ye courtiers the wonderful tale of the adventures that I experienced under this sorcery from the moment I first met this magician. ²⁶ I have seen as many passing scenes in one single moment under this wizard, as had been shown of old by Brahma in his destruction of the divine sorcery of Indra."

²⁷ Having said so, the king smiled and began to relate to his courtiers the strange wonders that he had seen in his state of hallucination.

²⁸ The king said:—

I saw a region full of objects of various kinds, such as rivers, lakes, cities and mountains, with many boundary hills, and the ocean surrounding the earth.

Chapter 106 — King Lavana Marries a Tribal Maiden

My own land abounding in forests and rivulets appeared like a miniature of this planet earth. ² This land of which I am king and where I am now sitting in my royal assembly hall, amidst my courtiers and all these citizens, appeared like the paradise of Indra.

⁹ Then being fatigued with my journey, and moving slowly on my wearied horse, I reached the edge of a desert which was as vacant as the mind of a pauper, and as empty as the heart of a woman. ¹⁰ It was like the wilderness of the world burned down by a conflagration, without even a bird flying over it. It was like a waste of sandy frost without a tree or any water in it. ¹¹ In its extent, it appeared like another sky or like the eighth ocean of the world. It was like a sea on earth with its bed entirely dried up. ¹² It was as expanded as the mind of a wise man, and as furious as the rage of the ignorant. There was no trace of human feet and no track with any grass or herb in it.

long day through the dreary waste, I took refuge under this tree like a traveler rests under the shelter of a kalpa tree at the setting of the sun.²⁴ All this business of the world was stopped as the sun went down to rest in the western hills

⁴⁶ Then she turned to me and said, “Know me to be a tribal (chandala, an outcaste) girl bearing the name of Harakeyuri. We are as cruel as rakshasa demons. We feed on human flesh and the meat of horses and elephants. ⁴⁷ O king, you cannot get your food simply by begging me for it, as it is hard to have the favor of men without first meeting their own desires.”

⁵² To this I replied, “I agree to take you to my wife, for what fool would adhere to his family customs when his life is in danger?” ⁵³ Then she then gave me half of the food she had with her, as Madhavi parted with half of her ambrosia to the hungry Indra of old. ⁵⁴ I ate the tribal’s food and drank the beverage of jambu fruits that she gave me. Then I rested at that place and fell into a sleep caused by my fatigue and long walking.

To this he expressed his approval by saying, “Vadham. Be it so by the end of this day.” ⁵⁹ He loosened the bulls from their yoke, as the lord of death releases his hell hounds. It was dusk when the sky was hidden by evening mist and the dust rising as the herds return, and we were dismissed from the demons’ presence to make our own way.

⁶⁵ Then we entered the house scattered with disgusting entrails and intestines. I thought I was like the ghost of a dead man standing beside the lord of death. ⁶⁶ I was offered a seat of a big plantain leaf, given with due respect so that I might be seated as a welcome guest in the abominable abode of my newly earned father-in-law. ⁶⁷ My squint eyed mother-in-law then eyed me with her blood-red eyeballs, and muttered with gladness in her look, “Is this our would be son-in-law?”

⁶⁸ Afterwards we sat on some seats made of skin and I partook of the meal served to me as reward for my sins. ⁶⁹ I heard many of those endearing words that are the seeds of endless misery, and many speeches that were unpleasant to my mind because they were of no benefit to me.

⁷⁰ One day afterwards, when the sky was cloudless and the stars were shining, it came to pass that they presented a dowry of cloths and other articles before me. ⁷¹ With these they gave that frightful maiden to me and we were joined together as black and white, and as sin and its torment together.

Chapter 107 — Life among the Tribals

What more shall I say of those festivities that had quite subdued my soul? From then on, my fellows called me Pushta-Pukkusha or cherished tribal. ² After a week long celebration, and after I had spent a full eight months at that place, my wife discharged blood and then her child also. ³ She delivered a daughter which is the cause of sorrow as danger is the spring of disasters. This daughter grew up as quickly as the cares and sorrows of the ignorant. ⁴ In another three years she again brought forth, this time a black boy, just like the fruit of folly raises false expectations of fruition. ⁵ She gave birth to another daughter, then another boy, and thus I became an old tribal with a large family in that forest land.

⁶ In this manner many years passed in that place with these shoots of my sorrow, like one who murders a brahmin has to pass long years of torment in hellfire. ⁷ I had to undergo all the pains of heat and cold and chill winds and frost without any help in that dreary forest, like an old tortoise is constrained to move about in the mud of a pool forever. ⁸ Being burdened with the cares of my family and troubled by anxieties of my mind, I saw my increasing afflictions like a fire burning all around me.

¹² The many quarrels, bickering, sorrows and wailings to which I was often exposed at home and abroad made my blood gush out in tears from my weeping eyes. ¹³ We passed nights on marshy grounds in the jungle, and being drenched by raining clouds, we took shelter in mountain caves with no food other than the roasted flesh of bears.

¹⁴ After the rainy season of sowing was over and the dark drizzling clouds dispersed, I was driven from my house by the unkindness of my relations and continued quarrelling with others. ¹⁵ Being thus in dread of everybody in the neighborhood, I moved to the house of another man where I lived with my wife and prattling children for some years. ¹⁶ Then vexed by the scolding of the quarrelsome tribal woman and the threats of the villainous tribals, my face became as pale as the waning moon under the shadow of Rahu. ¹⁷ My wife bit and scratched me as if a tigress had torn and gnawed upon my flesh and muscles. I was like a slave caught and sold to a hellish fiend. I thought that I had become changed into an infernal being.

¹⁸ I suffered under the torrents of snow thrown out of the caves of the Himalayas. I was exposed to showers of frost that fell continually in the dewy season. ¹⁹ I felt the iron shafts of rain on my naked body, like arrows fired from the bow of death. In my sickly and decrepit old age, I had to live upon the roots of withered vegetables. ²⁰ I dug them out plentifully from the woodland grounds and ate them with a zest, like a fortunate man has tasting his dainty dishes of well cooked meat. ²¹ I took my food apart and untouched by anybody for fear of being polluted by the touch of a vile and base born family, and because the pungency of my unsavory diet made my mouth scowl at every morsel.

²⁵ But when I was about to be cast into hell, time seemed to turn favorable by leading me to take refuge in mountain caves to seek my food there from the roots and plants growing there. ²⁶ In this state and by my good luck, I met some tribals driving away village dogs with their clubs. ²⁷ They gave my wife and children some bad rice like the villagers used to take, and we passed the night under the shade of a palm tree whose withered leaves rattled with the raindrops that fell in showers upon them. ²⁸ We passed the night in company with these woodland apes, our teeth clattering with cold and the hairs of our bodies standing on their ends from the cold like a thousand thorns. ²⁹ Raindrops decorated our bodies like granules of vivid pearls. From our hunger and lack of food, our bellies were as lean and lank as an empty cloud.

³⁰ Then my wife and I began to quarrel in this dreadful forest. We kept shouting at each another with our clattering teeth and eyes ruddy from the cold. ³¹ My foul and dirty body resembled that of a dark black demon, and we roved about the borders of rivers and brooks to fish with a rod and hook in my hand. ³² I also wandered with a trap in my hand, like Yama with his noose at the desolation of the earth, and caught, killed and drank the heart blood of deer in my hunger and thirst. ³³ I sucked the warm heart blood like milk from my mother's breast. Smearred in blood, I stood like a blood sucking demon in the cemetery. ³⁴ The vetala ghosts of the woods fled before me, as they do from the furies of the forests.

I set my snares and nets in the woods for catching deer and birds of the air. ³⁵ As people spread the nets of their wives and children, only to be entangled in them in the false hope of happiness, so did I spread my net of thread to beguile the birds to their destruction. ³⁶ Though worried and worn out in the nets of worldly cares and surrounded on every side by the miseries of our vicious lives, yet our minds still take delight in cruel and foul acts (to the injury of others).

⁴⁰ I underwent many difficulties that multiplied as thickly upon me as weeds growing in valleys. During my destined time, I moved about all corners of that hellish spot. ⁴¹ I have sown the seeds of sin under the rainwater of my ignorance to grow speedily as thorns on my way. I have laid hidden snares for the unwary innocent to bind myself in the mountain caves. ⁴² I have caught and killed innocent deer in traps to feed upon its flesh. I have killed the fly-whisk cow to lay my head on the hair hanging down their necks. ⁴³ I slept unconscious of myself in my ignorance, as Vishnu lay on his huge hydra. I laid with my outstretched legs and limbs in the brown cell, resounding to the yell of wild beasts outside. ⁴⁴ I also laid my body on the frost of a cave in the marshy ground of Vindhya, and wrapped my swarthy form in a tattered quilt full of fleas and hanging down my neck. ⁴⁵ I bore it on my back, as a bear carries the long bristles upon him even in the hot season. I suffered the heat of wildfires that burned many wild animals that perished in groups like in the last conflagration of the world.

⁴⁸ I raved sometimes in my rage, and wept at others in my bitter grief. I lived on coarse meals and dwelt, alas, in the houses of vulgar tribals. Thus I passed so many years of my misery at that place, as one fastened to the chains of his insatiable desires is doomed to toil and moil for nothing until his death.

Chapter 108 — King Lavana's Description of Drought & Wildfire

Time passed away. Old age overtook me and turned my beard to blades of grass covered with white frost. ² My days passed away in alternate joy and grief brought on by my fate and acts, just like a river flows with green and dried leaves scattered on it by the wind. ³ Every moment I suffered quarrels and arguments, misfortunes and bad luck. They beset me as thick and as fast as the arrows of sorrow flying in battle. ⁴ My foolish mind kept fluttering like a bird in the maze of my wishes and fancies. My heart was disturbed by passions, like the sea by its raging waves. ⁵ My soul was revolving on the vehicle of my wandering thoughts. I was carried away by them like floating straw to the whirlpool of the eventful ocean of time. ⁶ I, who moved about like a worm in the woodlands of Vindhya for my simple support, felt in the passing of years to be weakened and pulled down in my frame like a two-legged beast of burden. ⁷ In that state of my wretchedness, I forgot my royalty like a dead man and became convinced that I was a tribal bound to that hilly spot like a wingless bird.

¹³ People had ash all over their bodies and were starving for want of food and drink. The land was without any article of food or even grass or water. It had turned into a dreary desert. ¹⁴ The mirage of the desert glistened like water and deluded dry buffaloes to roll in it. There was no current of breeze to cool the desert air. ¹⁵ Only calls and cries for water came to the ears of men who were parched under the burning rays of the torrid sun. ¹⁶ The hungry mob, hurrying to browse upon branches and herbs, yielded their lives in those acts, while others sharpened their teeth tearing and devouring one another. ¹⁷ Some ran to bite the gum of catechu, thinking it to be a bit of flesh. Others swallowed stones as if they were cakes lying on the ground before them. ¹⁸ The ground was sprinkled with blood from men biting and tearing each other, like blood profusely spilled when a lion kills a big and starving elephant. ¹⁹ Every one was as ferocious as a lion in his attempt to devour another as his prey. Men fought each another like wrestlers in a contest.

²³ Strong, howling winds raised heaps of ashes like dust that stood like domes in the sky unsupported by pillars. Little children stood by their weeping parents, crying for fear of them. ²⁴There were some men who tore a dead body with their teeth and, in their great haste to devour the flesh, bit their own hands and fingers that were covered with their own blood. ²⁵Vultures flying in the air darted upon the smoke, thinking it a turret of trees, and pounced upon the firebrands, taking them for bits of raw flesh. ²⁶Men biting and tearing one another were flying in all directions when the splitting of burning wood hit their breasts and bellies and made them gory with blood gushing out of them. ²⁷Winds were howling in hollow caves and the flames of the wildfire flashed with fury. Snakes were hissing for fear of these, and the burned woods were falling down with hideous noise.

²⁸Thus beset by dangers and horrors, with no shelter other than the rugged hollows of rocks, this place presented a picture of this world with its encompassing flames burning like the twelve zodiacal suns on high. ²⁹Winds blowing hot in the burning woods and rocks dried up everything. The heat of the fire below and the sun above, together with the domestic disasters caused by influence of the planet Saturn, made this place a counterpart of this sorrowful world.

As the displeasure of destiny continued these disasters to rage in this place, prematurely overtaking the forest and people with the disasters of the last dissolution, ² some of these men with their wives and children went out from that place in search of some new places to live in foreign lands; like clouds disperse and disappear from the sky after the rainy season is over. ³ Wives, children and close relatives accompanied them, clinging like the members of their bodies, but the lean and infirm were left behind like branches broken from trees.

⁶ I separated from the connections of my father-in-law and others and depending upon myself, I escaped narrowly from that distressed country with my wife and children. ⁷ We passed pitfalls, storms, wild beasts and snakes without any harm. We came out of that forest safe from all the deadly perils along the way. ⁸ Arriving at the edge of that forest, we got under the shade of some palm trees where I let my children down from my shoulders as burdens of my sin and sorrows. ⁹ I halted here after my tiring journey and lengthened troubles, like one who had fled from the confines of hell. I took my rest like the withering lotus from the scorching sunbeams and heat of summer. ¹⁰ My tribal wife also slept under the same tree, and my two children lay fast asleep in each other's embrace under the cooling shade.

¹¹ Afterwards my younger son, Prach'chhaka, who was as dear to us as he was the less intelligent, rose up and stood before me. ¹² He said with a depressed spirit and tears gushing out of his eyes, "Father give me soon some meat-food and drink or else I die." ¹³ The little boy repeatedly made the same request, saying with tears in his eyes that he was dying of hunger. ¹⁴ I told him that I had no meat and the more I said so, the more he repeated his foolish craving, which could neither be supplied with nor put down to silence.

¹⁶ He agreed to it, and said, "Give it then." His hunger was so pressing and his vitality was so exhausted that he could not decline to crave my flesh for his food. ¹⁷ Being then overpowered by affection and compassion, I thought of putting an end to all my grief with my life which had become so intolerable to me at his extreme distress. ¹⁸ Being unable to endure the pain of my affection, I despaired of my own life and resolved to resort to death as my only friend at this last extreme.

¹⁹ I collected some wood and heaped them together for my funeral pile. Having put it on fire, I saw it blazing as I wished. ²⁰ As I was hurrying to throw myself on this burning pile, I suddenly was roused from my reverie by the sound of music proceeding from this palace, hailing me as king and shouting "jaya!" for my victory.

²¹ I understood this conjurer had wrought this enchantment on me and put me to all these imaginable troubles for so long a period. ²² Like the ignorant, I was subject to a hundred changes of fortune.

Vasishta speaking:—

As the great and mighty King Lavana was describing his fluctuations of fortune, ²³ the sorcerer suddenly disappeared from sight. The courtiers looked around with staring eyes, then addressed the king saying, ²⁴ “Our loyal lord, this man was no sorcerer with his own mercenary views. It was divine magic shown to our lord to demonstrate the lot of humanity and the state of the world.”

²⁸ “This delusive magic was not spread over the mind by any trick or art of a conjurer who wanted nothing more than his own gain. ²⁹ They who love money never go away by themselves without getting something. Therefore we are tossed on the waves of doubt to take him for a sorcerer.”

³⁰ Vasishta said:—

Rama, though I am sitting here at this moment before you and others of this assembly, yet I am quite aware of the truth of this story. It is no fiction like the tale for the boy that I told you before, nor is it any invention or hearsay of mine.

³¹ Thus the mind is enlarged by the various inventions of its imagination, just as a tree is extended by the expansion of its boughs and branches. The extended mind encompasses all things, like an outstretched tree spreads over the ground. The mind’s comprehension of everything and its familiarity with the nature of all things serve to lead it to its state of perfection.

Chapter 110 — Description of the Mind's Play

In the beginning, the subjective Consciousness (chit) derived the power of knowing objective phenomena (chetayas) from the Supreme Cause. Then it went on to multiply and diversify the objects of its intelligence and thus fell from the knowledge of the one intelligent Universal Ego to the delusion of particular non-egos without end.² Thus Rama, the faculties of the mind, being deluded by the unrealities of particulars and to their utter error, continue to attribute specialty and differences to the general ones.

vice-versa. ²¹ In whatever manner the mind represents itself in its various aspects, the same becomes evident to us both in our perceptions and conceptions of them.

²² It was by virtue of such a representation that the dreaming mind of King Harish Chandra took the course of one night for the long period of a dozen years. ²³ It was owing to a similar idea of the mind that the whole creation of Brahma appeared to be situated within himself. ²⁴ The presentation of a fair prospect before the imagination turns the present pain to pleasure, like a man bound in chains forgets his painful state in the hopes of his release the next morning.

²⁸ The mind by its own nature is restless with all its vain thoughts and desires within itself. Man is carried abroad by its currents over hills and deserts and across rivers and seas to far and remote cities and countries. ²⁹ The waking mind deems the objects of its desire to be as sweet as honey, and whatever it does not like to be as bitter as gall, even though they may be sweet to taste. ³⁰ Some minds with too much self reliance upon themselves and without considering the true nature of things give them different forms and colors according to their own conceptions and opinions, though they are far from truth.

³⁶ The mind is embodied in the physical body accompanied by the organs of sense. But it is the mind that actuates the senses and receives the sensations. The senses are the products of the mind, but the mind is not a production of sensations. ³⁷ Those great souls (philosophers) who have investigated the connection between the two quite different substances of body and mind, and those learned men who show us how body and mind are mutually related, are truly worthy of our veneration.

³⁸ A beautiful woman decorated with flowers in the braids of her hair and looking loosely with her amorous glances is like a log of wood in contact with the body of one whose mind is absent from himself. ³⁹ The dispassionate yogi who sits reclined in his abstract meditation in the forest, owing to the absence of his mind, has no sense of his hands being bitten off by a voracious beast.⁴⁰ The mind of a sage practiced in mental abstraction may with ease be inclined to convert his pleasures to pain and his pains to pleasure.

⁴⁶ As the leaves and branches, flowers and fruits are the products of the shooting seed, so everything that is seen in our waking dreams is the creation of our minds.⁴⁷ As a golden image is no other than gold, so the creatures of our living dreams are nothing but the creations of our fanciful mind.⁴⁸ As a drop or shower of rain, and a foam or froth of the wave, are only different forms of water, so the varieties of phenomena that are sensed are only transformations of the same mind.⁴⁹ These are only the thoughts of our minds seen in our waking dreams, like the various costumes that an actor wears to represent different characters in a play.⁵⁰ As King Lavana believed himself to be a tribal for some time, so we believe ourselves to be so-and-so by the thoughts of our minds.⁵¹ Whatever we think ourselves to be in our consciousness, the same soon comes to pass upon us. Therefore mold the thoughts of your mind in any way you like.

⁵² An embodied being sees many cities, towns, hills and rivers before him, all of which are only visions of waking dreams stretched out by the inner mind.⁵³ One sees a demon in a god and a snake where there is no snake. It is the idea that fosters the thought, as King Lavana fostered the thoughts of his ideal forms.⁵⁴ As the idea of man includes that of a woman, and the idea of father implies that of the son, so the mind includes the wish, and with every person the wish is accompanied by its action.

⁵⁵ It is by its wish that the mind is subject to death to be born again in other bodies. Though the mind is a formless thing of its nature, yet by its constant habit of thinking, it contracts the notion of it being a living substance (jiva).⁵⁶ The mind is busy with thoughts of long drawn wishes that cause its repeated births and deaths, and their accompaniments of hopes and fears, and pleasure and pain.

⁶⁰ It is the mind that is satisfied and delighted at the fulfillment of our wishes, and not the body which is unconscious of its enjoyments. ⁶¹ The mind is delighted with its imaginary desires within the body, like a secluded woman takes delight in the harem. ⁶² He who does not give indulgence to levities and fickleness in his heart is sure to subdue his mind, as one binds an elephant by its chain to the post. ⁶³ He whose mind does not wave back and forth like a brandished sword, but remains fixed as a pillar to its best intent and object, is the best of men on earth. All others are like insects continually moving in the mind.

⁶⁶ The thoughts of the mind embroiled in worldly cares become the sources of those turbulent passions in the heart which, like poisonous plants, fill this harmful world.

Chapter 111 — The Necessity to Control the Heart & Mind

Now listen to what I will tell you is the best remedy to heal the disease of the heart. It is within one's own power and harmless and a sweet potion to taste.

² It is by your own exertion of your own consciousness and by diligent renunciation of the best objects of your desire that you can bring back your unmanageable mind under your control. ³ He who remains at rest by giving up the objects of his desire is truly the conqueror of his mind which is reduced under his subjection like an elephant lacking its tusks. ⁴ The mind is to be carefully treated like a patient with prescriptions of reason and by discriminating truth from untruth, just as we distinguish a good diet from what is injurious. ⁵ Mold your heated imagination by cool reasoning, by precepts of the scriptures, and by association with the dispassionate, as they do heated iron with a cold hammer.

⁶ Like a boy who suffers no pain turning himself this way and that in his play, so it is not difficult to turn the mind from one thing to another at pleasure. ⁷ Employ your mind to acts of goodness by the light of your understanding and join your soul to the meditation of God by light of your spirit.

¹⁷ Many persons turn their minds away from mindfulness by too much trust in their efforts and imagined expectations, and disregarding the power of destiny that rules over all human efforts.

¹⁸ The mind when is becomes long practiced in its highest duty, the cultivation of divine knowledge, becomes extinct in consciousness and is elevated to its higher state of intellectual form. ¹⁹ Join yourself first to your intellectual or abstract thoughts, and then to your spiritual speculations. Then, being the master of your mind, contemplate on the nature of the Supreme Soul. ²⁰ Thus relying on your own efforts and converting the conscious mind to its state of detached unconsciousness, you can attain that highest state of stability that knows no decay or destruction.

²⁸ Whether the mind wanders here or goes to another world with its earthly thoughts, it continues in the same state as before unless it is changed to another form by its attainment of liberation. ²⁹ It is in vain that we are overwhelmed in sorrow upon the death of our brethren and dependents. We know it is the nature of the mind to be deluded from its state of pure consciousness to that of error. ³⁰ It is repeatedly stated, both before and afterwards and in many other places (of this work), that there is no other means of obtaining true knowledge without subduing the mind. ³¹ I repeat the same lesson, that there is no way except by government of the unruly mind to come to the light of the truly real, clear and universal knowledge of the Supreme.

³² The mind destroyed, the soul attains its tranquility and the light of the intellect shines forth in the cavity of the heart. ³³ Hold fast the discus of reason, and cut off the bias of your mind. Be sure that no disease will have the power to molest you if you can have the good sense to despise objects of pleasure that are attended by pain. ³⁴ By lopping the members of the mind, you cut it off altogether. These members, the essence of the mind, are ego and selfishness.

Shun your sense that "It is I" and "These are mine." ³⁵ Without these feelings, the mind is cast down like a tree felled by the axe. It is dispersed like a scattered cloud from the autumn sky. ³⁶ The mind is blown away by its lack of ego and selfishness, like a cloud by the winds.

³⁷ It is dangerous to wage a war against winds, weapons, fire or water in order to obtain the objects of worldly desire, but there is no danger whatever in destroying the growing soft and tender desires of the mind. ³⁸ What is good and what is not are well known for certain, even to children. Therefore employ your mind to what is good, as they train children in the paths of goodness.

⁴¹ The man without desires cares for nothing: whether the winds howl with the fury of storms, or the seas break their bounds, or the twelve suns (of the Zodiac) rise at once to burn the universe. ⁴² The mind is the root that grows the plants of our good and evil and all our happiness and sorrow. The mind is the tree of the world, and all peoples are like its branches and leaves. ⁴³ One who has freed his mind from its desires prospers everywhere. He who lives in the dominion of detachment rests in his heavenly joy. ⁴⁴ The more we curb the desires of our minds, the greater we feel our inward happiness. Like the fire being extinguished, we find ourselves cooled from its heat.

⁴⁵ Should the mind long for millions of worldly mansions in its highest ambition, it is sure to have them spread out to view within the minute particle of its own essence. ⁴⁶ Opulence in expectancy is full of anxiety to the mind. When gained, the expected wealth is no less troublesome to the mind. But the treasure of contentment is filled with lasting peace of mind. Therefore, be victorious over your greedy mind by abandonment of all your desires.

⁴⁷ With the highly holy virtue of your un-mindfulness, and with the even-mindedness of those who have known the Divine Spirit, and also with the subdued, moderated and defeated yearnings of your heart, make the state of the uncreated One as your own.

Chapter 112 — Motion (Restlessness) Is Inherent in the Mind; the Mind Is Its Own Cure

Whatever the nature of the object of any man's desire, his mind does not fail to run after it with great eagerness in every place. ² This eagerness of the mind rises and sets by turns with the view of the desired object, like clear bubbles of water foaming and bursting of themselves with the breath of winds. ³ As coldness is the nature of frost and blackness is that of ink, so is swiftness or momentum the nature of the mind, as stillness is that of the soul.

⁴ Rama said, "Tell me sage, why is the mind identified with motion, and what is the cause of its velocity? Tell me also if there is any other force that can impede the mind's motion?"

⁵ Vasishta replied:—

We have never seen the motionless quiet of the mind. Speed is the nature of the mind, like heat is that of fire. ⁶ This vacillating power of motion which is implanted in the mind is known to be of the same nature as that of the self-motive force of the Divine Mind that is the cause of the momentum and motion of those worlds. ⁷ As the essence of air is imperceptible without its movement, so we can have no notion of the momentum of our minds apart from the idea of their vibration.

⁸ The mind which has no motion is said to be dead and defunct. The suspension of mental agitation is the condition of yoga stillness and leads to our ultimate liberation.

²⁰ Our minds are the boats to lift us from the ocean of this world where we are carried too far by its beating waves and thrown into the whirlpools of despair, and where we are caught by the sharks of our greediness. ²¹ Let your own mind cut the mind's net that is ensnared in this world and extricate your soul by this wise policy, which is the only means of your liberation. ²² Let the wise destroy the desires of their minds and this will set them free from the bonds of ignorance. ²³ Shun your desire for earthly enjoyments and forsake your knowledge of dualism. Then get rid of your impressions of entity and non-entity and be happy with the knowledge of one unity.

²⁴ Thought of the unknowable will remove the thoughts of known phenomena. This is equivalent to the destruction of desires, and also of the mind and ignorance. ²⁵ The unknown One of which we are unconscious by our knowledge of phenomena transcends anything and everything known by our consciousness. Our unconsciousness is our nirvana and final extinction, while our consciousness is the cause of our sorrow. ²⁶ By their own attention, men soon come to the knowledge of phenomena, but it is the unknowing or unconsciousness of these that is our nirvana. Our consciousness is the cause of our sorrow.

²⁷ Destroy, O Rama, whatever is desirable to your mind and is the object of your affection. Then knowing them as reduced to nothing, forsake your desires as seedless sprouts and live content without the feelings of joy and grief.

Chapter 113 — Description of Ignorance & Delusion (Avidya)

False desires that continually rise in the heart are like the appearances of false moons in the sky and should be shunned by the wise. ² They rise in the minds of the unwise amidst their ignorance. Everything that is known only by its name and not in actuality cannot reside in the minds of wise people.

³ Be wise, O Rama, and do not think like the ignorant. Consider well all that I tell you. There is no second moon in the sky, but it appears so only by deception of our optical visions. ⁴ There exists nothing real or unreal anywhere except the only true essence of God, just like there is no substantiality in the continuity of the waves other than the body of waters. ⁵ There is no reality in anything, whether existent or non-existent, all which are mere creations of your shadowy ideality. Therefore do not impute any shape or figure to the eternal, boundless and pure spirit of God.

⁹ If truth is delectable and untruth is odious, then remain firm to what is good and be employed in your duties. ¹⁰ But as the whole world is a gallery, a magic, and an unreality, then say what reliance is there in it and what signifies pleasure or displeasure to anybody?

a mist, but try to lay hold on it and it proves to be nothing. ⁴² This earth is a handful of ashes which being flung aloft flies in particles of dust. It is like the upper sky which appears to be blue but has no blueness in it.

⁵⁶ Rama said, "It is wonderful that a false conception that has no real existence and is so delicate as almost a nothing (but a name) should thus blind the understanding. ⁵⁷ It is strange that something without form or figure, without sense or understanding, and which is unreal and vanishing, should so blindfold the world. ⁵⁸ It is strange that a thing sparkling in darkness and vanishing in daylight, and shortsighted as the brooding owl, should keep the world in darkness. ⁵⁹ It is strange that something prone to doing evil and unable to come to light and flying from sight, and having no bodily form whatever, should thus darken the world. ⁶⁰ It is a wonder that one acting so miserly and consorting with the mean and vile, and ever hiding herself in darkness, should thus dominate the world. ⁶¹ It is wonderful that fallacy attended with constant sorrow and peril, and which is devoid of sense and knowledge, should keep the world in darkness. ⁶² It is to be wondered that error arising from anger and greed, creeping crookedly in darkness and liable to instant death, should yet keep the world in blindness. ⁶³ It is surprising that error which is a blind, dull and stupid thing itself, and which is falsely talkative at all times, should yet mislead others in the world. ⁶⁴ It is astonishing that falsehood should betray a man after attaching as closely to him as his consort, and showing all her endearments to him, but flying at the approach of his reason.⁶⁵ It is strange that man should be blinded by the womanish attire of error which beguiles the man but dares not to look at him face to face.⁶⁶ It is strange that man is blinded by his faithless consort of error which has no sense or intelligence and which dies away without being killed.”

⁶⁷“Tell me sage, how this error — which has its seat in the desires and is deeply rooted in the recesses of the heart and mind, and leads us to the channels of endless misery by subjecting us to repeated births and deaths and to the pains and pleasures of life — is to be dispelled?”

Chapter 114 — Description of Error

¹ Rama repeated, “Tell me sage, how to remove this stony blindness of man caused by the trick of ignorance (avidya)?”

² Vasishta replied:—

As the particles of snow melt at the sight of the sun, so this ignorance is dispelled immediately by a glance of the Supreme Spirit. ³ Until then, ignorance continues to hurl down the soul and spirit, as from a precipice to the depths of the world, and expose them to sorrows as thick as thorny brambles.

¹¹ Rama asked, “The knowledge of phenomena as true makes what we call avidya or ignorance, and it is said to be dispersed by spiritual knowledge. Now tell me sage, what is the nature of the Spirit?”

¹² Vasishta replied:—

That which is not the subject of thought, which is all-pervasive, and the thought of which is beyond expression and comprehension is the Universal Spirit. ¹³ That which reaches to the highest heaven of God and stretches over the lowest plots of grass on earth is the all-pervading spirit at all times, and is unknown to the ignorant soul. ¹⁴ All this is truly Brahman, eternal and imperishable Consciousness. To Him no imagination of the mind can reach at anytime.

¹⁵ That which is never born or dead and which is ever existent in all worlds, and in which the conditions of being and change are altogether wanting, ¹⁶ which is one and one alone, all and all-pervading, and imperishable Unity, which is incomprehensible in thought, and is only of the form of Intellect is the Universal Spirit. ¹⁷ It is accompanied with the ever-existent, all-extending, pure and undisturbed Consciousness and is that calm, quiet, even and unchanging state of the soul which is called the Divine Spirit.

¹⁸ There resides also the impure mind, which is by nature beyond all physical objects and runs after its own desire. It is conceivable by Consciousness as sullied by its own activity. ¹⁹ This ubiquitous, all-potent, great and godlike mind, in its imagination, separates itself from the Supreme Spirit and rises from it like a wave on the surface of the sea.²⁰ There is no fluctuation or projection in the all-extending tranquil soul of God, but these take place in the mind owing to its desires which cause the production of all things in the world.²¹ Therefore the world, being the production of desire or will, has its extinction with the privation of desires, for that which is the growth of a thing causes its extinction also, like the wind that kindles the fire also extinguishes it.

²² The exertion of human effort gives rise to the expectation of results, but lack of desire causes the cessation of exertions and consequently puts a stop to the desire of activity and our ignorance that causes desire.²³ The thought that “I am distinct from Brahman” binds the mind to the world, but the belief that “Brahman is all” releases the mind from its bondage.²⁴ Every thought about one’s self fastens his bondage in this world, but release from selfish thoughts leads him to his liberation. Cease from your selfish cares and you shall cease to work with persistence for nothing.

²⁹ Men are busy with worldly affairs with such thoughts as, “I am poor and bound in this earth for my life; but I have my hands and feet with which I must work for myself.”³⁰ But they are freed from all affairs of this life who know themselves as spiritual beings, and that their spiritual part is neither subject to bondage nor labor.³¹ The thought that “I am neither flesh or bones but some thing other than my body” releases one from his bondage. One having such assurance within is said to have weakened his avidya or ignorance.

³⁵ Rama said, “Tell me sage, what is the cause of the blueness of the sky if it is not the reflection of the blue gems on the Meru’s peak? Is it a collection of darkness (at night) by itself?”

³⁶ Vasishta replied:—

Rama, the sky being only an empty vacuum cannot have the quality of blueness which is commonly attributed to it. Nor is it the bluish luster of the blue gems that are supposed to abound on the top of Meru.³⁷ Nor is there any possibility of a body of darkness abiding in the sky when the cosmic egg is full of light (which has displaced the primeval darkness) and when the nature of light is the brightness that stretches over the extraterrestrial regions.

³⁸ O fortunate Rama, the sky which is a vast vacuum is open to a sister of ignorance with regard to its inner hollowness. ³⁹ As one after losing his eyesight sees only darkness all about him, so the lack of the objects of sight in the womb of emptiness gives the sky the appearance of a dark scene. ⁴⁰ By understanding this, as you come to the knowledge that the apparent blackness of the sky is no black color of its own, so you come to learn the seeming darkness of ignorance to be no darkness in reality.

⁴² It is better, O good Rama, to distrust the delusions of this world and disbelieve the blueness of the sky than to labor under the error of their reality. ⁴³ The thought that “I am dead” makes one as sad as when he dreams of his death in sleep. Similarly, the thought that “I am living” makes one as cheerful as when he wakes from the deadly dream of his death-like sleep. ⁴⁴ Foolish imaginations make the mind as dull as that of a fool, but reasonable reflections lead it to wisdom and clear sightedness.

⁴⁵ A moment’s reflection of the reality of the world and of his own essence casts a man into the gloom of everlasting ignorance, while his forgetfulness of these removes all mortal thoughts from his mind.

⁴⁹ What did not exist at first has no existence even now. That which appears as existent is nothing other than the quiescent and immaculate essence, Brahma himself. ⁵⁰ Let no other thought of any person, thing, place or object employ your mind at anytime, except that of the immutable, everlasting and unlimited spirit of Brahma. ⁵¹ Rely upon the superior powers of your understanding, exert your sovereign intellect, and root out all worldly desires by enjoyment of the pleasures of your mind.

⁵² The great ignorance that rises in the mind and raises the desires of your heart has spread the net of your false hopes for your ruin, causing your death and decrepitude under them. ⁵³ Your wishes burst out in expressions such as, “These are my sons and these are my treasures. I am such a one and these things are mine.” All this is the effect of a magic spell of ignorance that binds you tightly. ⁵⁴ Your body is a void in which your desires have produced all your selfish thoughts, like empty winds raising waves on the surface of the sea.

⁵⁵ Learn, you who are seekers of truth, that the words “I” and “mine” and “this” and “that” are all meaningless in their true sense. There is nothing that may be called real at anytime except knowledge of the true self and essence of Brahman.

⁵⁸ Rama, know that only the ignorant are liable to the error of taking the earth, sun and stars for realities; not so the learned to whom the great Brahman is present in all his majesty and full glory in all places and things. ⁵⁹ While the ignorant labor under the doubt of two ideas, a rope and a snake in the rope, the learned are firm in their belief and sight of one true God in all things.

⁶⁰ Therefore do not think like the ignorant, but well consider all things like the wise and the learned. Forsake your earthly wishes and do not grope like the vulgar by believing the not-self to be the self.

⁶¹ Of what good is this dull and dumb body to you, Rama, (in your future state) that you are so overcome by alternating joy and grief at its pleasure and pain? ⁶² Like the wood of a tree, its gum resin, and its fruit and seed are not one and the same thing, though they are so closely related to one another, so this body and the embodied being are quite separate from one another, though they are so closely united with each other.

⁶³ As the burning of a pair of bellows does not blow out the fire or stop the air blown by another pair, so the vital air is not destroyed by destruction of the body but finds its way into another form and frame elsewhere. ⁶⁴ The thought that "I am happy or miserable" is as false as the idea of water in a mirage. Knowing it as such, give up your misconceptions of pleasure and pain and place your reliance upon the sole truth. ⁶⁵ O how wonderful it is that men have so utterly forgotten the true Brahman and have placed their reliance on false ignorance, the sole cause of errors.

⁷¹ If the mind is not filled and led away by worldly desires, then there is no fear of falling into the dangers that the daydreams of our earthly affairs constantly present before us. ⁷² The more our false knowledge lays hold of our minds, the more we feel the torments of hell and its punishments in us, like nightmares in sleep. ⁷³ The mind pierced by error, as if by the thorny stalk of a lotus, sees the whole world revolving before it like the sea rolling with its waves. ⁷⁴ Ignorance takes possession of the mind, converts enthroned princes to peasants, and reduces them to a condition worse than that of beastly hunters.

Being thus encouraged by the high minded Vasishta, Rama's lotus eyes became opened like new blown flowers. ² He shone forth with a pure grace, his heart expanded and his face blooming like the fresh lotus reviving at the end of night under the vivifying beams of the rising sun. ³ His smiling face shone like the moon with inward enlightenment and wonder. Then, with the nectar beams of his bright and white pearly teeth, Rama spoke out these words.

⁴ Rama said, "What a wonder that the lack of ignorance should subdue all things, as if it could tie down huge hills with the thin threads of lotus stalks. ⁵ O, that this straw of the earth, which shows itself to be so dense a body in the world, is no more than the production of our ignorance which shows the unreal as a reality. ⁶ Tell me more for my enlightenment regarding the true nature of this magical earth which rolls like a ceaseless stream running amidst the ethereal worlds."

¹⁰ Vasishta said:—

The body is like a frame of woodwork that contains nothing. It receives the reflection of an intelligence as in a dream, and this is called the mind. ¹¹ This mind becomes the living principle (life) and also has the power of thinking. It is as unstable as a boat on the current of world of affairs, and it plays the part of a fickle monkey amidst the busy castle of the world.

¹² The active principle in the body is known under different names — the mind, life and ego — and having a body for its home, it is employed in a variety of actions. ¹³ This active principle is subject to endless pains and pleasures in its unenlightened or un-awakened state, and the body has no relation with them. ¹⁴ Unenlightened understanding also has received many fictitious names according to the various faculties that it exhibits in its acts. ¹⁵ As long as an un-awakened mind is in its sleeping state, it perceives the busy bustle of the world as in a dream, which is unknown to the waking or enlightened mind.

¹⁸ That which the learned call the heart, the mind, the individual soul, ignorance, desire, and the principle of action is the embodied being that is subject to the feelings of both pleasure and pain. ¹⁹ The body is dull matter unconscious of pain and pleasure. Men of right reason say that the embodied being is subject to pain and pleasure because of its stubborn ignorance and irrationality. The embodied being is the cause of its own misery. ²⁰ The individual soul is the subject of its good and bad actions. It becomes confined in its body because of its irrationality and remains trapped there like a silkworm in its cocoon.

²³ As the master of the house does his many acts in it, and not the house itself, so the mind acts its different parts in the body, and not the body by itself. ²⁴ The mind is the active and passive agent of all actions and passions, and of the pains and pleasures of the body. It is only the mind that makes the man.

²⁵ Now hear me tell you the useful moral of the story of Lavana, and how he was transformed to a tribal (chandala, outcaste) by derangement of his mind. ²⁶ The mind has to feel the effects of its actions whether good or evil. In order that you may understand it well, listen attentively to what I will now tell you.

²⁷ Lavana was born of the line of King Harish Chandra. One day, as he was sitting apart from all others of his court, he was thinking to himself, ²⁸ “My grandfather was a great king and performed the rajasuya sacrifice. I, being born of his line, must perform the same in my mind.”

³⁴ Hence learn to know that the mind is the recipient of pleasure and pain. Therefore employ your attention, Rama, to the purification of your mind. ³⁵ Every man becomes perfect in his mind in its full time and proper place, but he is utterly lost who believes himself to be composed only of his body.

Chapter 116 — Moral of King Lavana's Experience; Summary of Creation & Liberation

¹ Rama asked, "Sage, what is the evidence that Lavana obtained the reward of his mental rajasuya sacrifice through his transformation into the state of a tribal, as it was wrought upon him by the enchantment of the magician?"

² Vasishta answered:—

I was myself present at King Lavana's court when the magician made his appearance and I saw everything that took place with my own eyes. ³ After the magician finished his work and left, King Lavana respectfully asked me with the other courtiers to explain to him what had happened. ⁴ After I pondered the matter and had clearly seen its cause, I explained the meaning of the magician's spell. This is the way I will now explain it to you, my Rama!

⁵ I remembered that all those who performed rajasuya sacrifice were subjected to various painful difficulties and dangers which they had to suffer for a full dozen of years. ⁶ It was then that Indra, the lord of heaven, had compassion for Lavana and sent his heavenly messenger in the form of the magician to avert his calamity. ⁷ He taxed the king who would make the rajasuya sacrifice with the infliction of the very many hardships in his dream, then departed on his aerial journey to the abode of the gods and spiritual masters.

⁸ Thus Rama, it is quite evident and there is no doubt in it. The mind is the active and passive agent of all kinds of actions and their sequences. ^(a) Therefore rub out the dirt of your heart, and polish the gem of your mind. Using the fire of your reason to melt the mind down like a particle of ice, attain your chief supreme good at last. ^(b) Know the mind is identical to ignorance, which by its magical power presents these multitudes and endless varieties of beings and things before you. ^(c) There is no difference in the meanings of the words "ignorance," "mind," "understanding" and "individual soul," as in the word "tree" and all its synonyms. ^(d) Knowing this truth, keep a steady mind free from all its desires. As the orb of the clear sun of your intellect has its rise, so the darkness of your willing and unwilling flies away from you. ^(e) Know also this truth: there is nothing in the world that you cannot see or which you cannot make your own or which can be taken away from you. There is nothing that does not die or what is not yours or some else's. All things become all at all times.

¹⁰ Rama said:— "Sage, you said that by weakening the desires of our mind, we can put an end to our pleasures and pains. But tell me now, how is it possible to stop the course of our naturally fickle minds?"

¹¹ Vasishta replied:—

Hear, O bright moon of Raghu's race! I will tell you the proper course for quieting the restless mind. By knowing this you shall obtain peace of mind and be freed from the actions of your organs of sense.

¹² I have told you before about the triple nature of the production of beings here below which, I believe, you well remember. ¹³ Of these the first is that power (Brahma) who assumed to himself the shape of the Divine Will and saw in his presence in whatever he wished to produce, through which he brought the physical system into existence. ¹⁴ He thought of many changes in his mind, like those of birth and death, pleasure and pain, the course of nature and the effect of ignorance, and the like. Then having ordained them as he willed, he disappeared of himself like snow before sunlight.

¹⁵ Thus this god, the personification of Will, rises and sets repeatedly as he is prompted from time to time by his inner wish. ¹⁶ So there are millions of Brahmas born in this cosmic egg. Many have gone by and are yet to come, whose number is innumerable. ¹⁷ All living beings are in the same predicament as Brahma, proceeding continually from the entity of God.

Now I will tell you how they live and how they are liberated from the bonds of life.

²⁴ A man possessed of the right discrimination of good and evil, and of right and wrong, and who is confident of the purity of his own nature and of his belonging to the best caste (brahmin) by degrees attains supernatural powers for his own good, as also for the enlightenment of his mind, by means of his knowledge of the seven essential grounds of yoga meditation.

Chapter 117 — The Seven States of Ignorance

¹ Rama said, “Please sage, tell me briefly, what are the grounds of yoga meditation that produce the seven kinds of consummation that are the aims of yogi adepts. You are best acquainted with all esoteric truths. You, sage, must know better than all others.

They consist of the seven descending states of ignorance and the seven ascending states of knowledge. These again diverge into many others by their mixtures together. ³ All these states of ignorance and knowledge, being deep rooted in the nature of man either by his habit or training, produce their respective results. ⁴ Attend now to the nature of the seven states or grounds of ignorance, and you will also come to know the nature of the seven grounds of knowledge.

⁵ This will be the shortest lesson that I will give you about the definitions of true knowledge and ignorance. One’s own true nature is his highest knowledge and liberation. Whatever distracts one from this knowledge to the false sense of individual ego is the cause of his ignorance that leads him to the error and bondage of this world. ⁶ Those who do not deviate from their awareness of the self as composed of only pure consciousness are not liable to ignorance because they lack passions, affections, and the feelings of envy and enmity. ⁷ The greatest ignorance and error of mankind is forgetting self awareness and diving into consciousness (chit) after thoughts of cognizable objects.

⁹ That state of the soul when it is calm after the setting of the thoughts and desires of the mind, and which is as cold and quiet as the bosom of a stone, and yet without the dullness of slumber or dull drowsiness, is called the repose of the soul in its recognition of itself. ¹⁰ The soul is said to be at rest in itself and shines forth with its unsleeping intelligence when it is devoid of its sense of ego, destitute of its knowledge of dualism, and lacking in any distinction between it and the state of the one Universal Soul.

¹¹ This state of the pure and self-intelligent soul is hidden by the various states of ignorance which I will now describe to you. These are three states of wakefulness known as embryonic waking, ordinary waking, and intense waking. ¹² Again, the different states of dreaming are also said to be the grounds of its ignorance and these are waking dream, sleeping dream, sleepy waking and sound sleep (susupti). These are the seven grounds of ignorance. ¹³ These are the seven grounds that produce sheer ignorance. When joined with one another they become many more mixed states known under different names, as you will hear by and by.

¹⁴ At first there was the intelligent Consciousness which gave rise to the nameless and pure intelligence which became the source of the would-be mind and individual soul. ¹⁵ This intellect remained as the ever waking embryonic seed of all, which is why it is called the waking seed. It is the first condition of cognition, so it is said to be the primal waking state.

¹⁶ The waking state is next to the primal waking intelligence of God, and it is the belief in the individual personality of the ego. ¹⁷ The great waking (mahajagrat) is the firm belief that I am such a one, and this thing is mine, by virtue of my merits in this or bygone times (karma).¹⁸ The cognition of the reality of anything, either by bias or mistake, is called the waking dream. Examples are the sight of two moons in the halo, of silver in shells, water in the mirage, and the imaginary castle building of day dreamers.

²⁶ A long continuous waking dream is described as the waking state (jagrat) and it becomes diversified according to the diversity of its objects.²⁷ The waking state contains under it the conditions of the wakeful soul of God. Also, there are many things under these conditions that mislead men from one error to another, like a storm casts boats into whirlpools and eddies.²⁸ Some of the lengthened dreams in sleep appear like the waking sight of daylight, while others, though seen in the broad daylight of the waking state, are no better than night-dreams seen in the daytime, and therefore are called our daydreams.

Chapter 118 — The Seven Stages of Knowledge

O sinless Rama, now listen about the seven stages of awareness. This knowledge will keep you from plunging into the mire of ignorance. ² Disputants are apt to describe many more stages of yoga meditation but in my opinion, these seven are sufficient to attain the chief good of ultimate liberation.

³ Knowledge is understanding. It is enough for understanding to know only these seven stages. However, liberation, which is the object of knowledge, transcends knowing these seven stages.

⁵ The grounds of knowledge comprise the desire of becoming good, and this good will is the first step. Then comes discretion or reasoning the second, followed by purity of mind, which is the third grade to gaining knowledge. ⁶ The fourth is self reliance as the true refuge, then worldly apathy as the fifth. The sixth is the power of abstraction, and the seventh or the last stage of knowledge is generalization of all in one (turya-gati). ⁷ Liberation is placed at the end of these and is attained without difficulty after them.

Attend now to the definitions of these steps as I shall explain them to you.

¹⁷ Those fortunate men, O Rama, who have arrived at the seventh stage of knowledge are those great minds who delight in the light of their souls and have reached their highest state of humanity. ¹⁸ The living liberated are not plunged in the waters of pleasure and sorrow, but remain sedate and unmoved in both states. They are at liberty either to do or to slight the discharge of the duties of their conditions and positions in society. ¹⁹ These men, being roused from their deep meditation by intruders, may assume their secular duties like men awakened from their slumber. ²⁰ Being ravished by the inner delight of their souls, they feel no pleasure in the delights of the world, just as men immersed in sound sleep can feel no delight at the dalliance of beauties about them.

²¹ These seven stages of knowledge are known only to wise and thinking men and not to beasts, brutes or inert things all around us. They are unknown to barbarians and those who are barbarous in their minds and dispositions. ²² But anyone who has attained these states of knowledge, whether it be a beast or barbarian, an embodied being or disembodied spirit, has undoubtedly obtained its liberation.

Chapter 119 — Illustration of the Gold Ring: Form Versus Substance

The human soul reflecting on its sense of ego forgets its essence of the Supreme Soul, just as a gold ring thinking on its round form loses its thought of the gold substance of which it is made.

² Rama said, “Please tell me sage, how can gold have consciousness of its form of a ring, like a soul is conscious of its sense of ego?”

³ Vasishta said:—

The consciousness of men relates only to their substance and not the production and dissolution of their forms. So you should ask about the substance of the soul and gold, and not of ego and the ring, which are unsubstantial nothings in nature. ⁴ When the jeweler sells his gold ring for the price of gold, he undoubtedly delivers the gold which is the substance of the ring and not the ring without its substance.

⁵ Rama asked, “If such is the case, that you take the gold for the ring, then what becomes of the ring as we commonly take it to be? Explain this to me so that thereby I may know the substance of Brahman.”

⁶ Vasishta said:—

All form, O Rama, is formless and accidental quality without any essential property. So, if you would ascertain the nature of a non-existence, then tell me the shape and qualities of a barren woman’s son.

¹⁴ There is nothing real or unreal on earth other than the false creations of our brain, and these whether known as real or unreal are equally productive of their consequences, like the sights and fears of ghosts in children. ¹⁵ A thing, whether it is so or not, proves itself as it is believed to be by different kinds and minds of men. Poison becomes as effective as an elixir to the sick, and ambrosia proves as heinous as hemlock with the immoderate.

¹⁶ Belief in only the essence of the soul constitutes true knowledge. Belief in individual ego and mind, as these are generally believed in this world, is ignorance. Therefore abandon the thought of your false and unfounded sense of ego as individual existence. ¹⁷ As there is no roundness of the ring inherent in gold, so there are no individual egos in the all-pervading Universal Soul.

¹⁸ There is nothing everlasting beside Brahman and no personality of Him as a Brahma, Vishnu or any other. There is no substantive existence such as the world, only Brahma's offspring called the patriarchs. ¹⁹ There are no other worlds beside Brahma, nor is there any heaven without Him. Hills, demons, mind and body all rest in that spirit which is not any of these. ²⁰ He is no elementary principle, nor is he any material cause. He is none of the three times of past, present and future but all. He is not anything in being or not-being. ²¹ He is beyond your concepts of individual ego, selfhood and selfishness, and all your entities and non-entities. There is no attribution or particularity in He who is above all your ideas. He is none of the ideal personifications of your notions.

²² He is the fullness of the world, supporting and moving all, being unmoved and unsupported by any. He is everlasting bliss without decay, having no name or symbol or cause of his own. ²³ He is no being (sat) that is born and existent, nor is He non-existent. He is neither the beginning, middle or end of anything, but is all in all. He is unthinkable in the mind, and unutterable by speech. He is vacuum about the emptiness, and a bliss above all joy.

²⁴ Rama said, "Now I understand that Brahman is the same in all things, yet I want to know what is this creation that we see all about us?"

²⁵ Vasishtha replied:—

The Supreme Spirit being perfectly tranquil and all things being situated in Him, it is wrong to speak of this creation or that when there is no such thing as a creation at anytime.

²⁶ All things exist in the all containing spirit of God, just as the whole body of water is contained in the universal ocean. But there is fluctuation in the waters owing to their fluidity, whereas there is no motion in the quiet and motionless spirit of God.

of God. ³⁶ This fullness which appears as the created world is essentially the Great Brahma and is situated in his greatness, just as the sky is situated in the sky, tranquility in tranquility, and joy in joy.

Chapter 120 — King Lavana Visits the Forest Where He Lived as a Tribal; Lamentation of the Woman Tribal

Now Rama, listen to the wonderful power of error displayed in changing phenomena, like the changing forms of ornaments in the substance of the same gold.

² King Lavana, having perceived the falsehood of his vision at the end of his dream, resolved the following day to visit that great forest himself. ³ He thought to himself, “Ah! When shall I revisit the Vindhyan region? It is inscribed in my mind and I remember having undergone a great many hardships in my life there as a forester.”

⁴ So saying, he traveled south accompanied by his ministers and attendants, as if he was going to make a conquest of that quarter. In a few days he arrived at the foot of the mountain. ⁵ There he wandered about the southern, eastern and western shores of the sea. He was as delighted with his round course as the luminary of the day in his daily journey from east to west. ⁶ In a certain region, he saw a deep and sorrowful forest stretching wide along his path, like the dark and dismal realms of death. ⁷ Wandering in this region he saw everything he had seen in his dream. He inquired into former circumstances, and wandered to learn whether they were that same as what he saw in his vision.

tremendous gale blows a tamara tree branch with its clustering flowers from this woodland scene.

²⁰ "O young prince, who was as fair as the full moon and did forsake the fairies of your harem, and who took so much delight in my daughter, where have you fled from us? Ah my daughter! She too is dead in your absence and fled from my presence. ²¹ Being cast on the waves of this earthly ocean and joined to the daughter of a tribal, you were, O prince, subjected to mean and vile employment that disgraced your princely character. ²² Ah! that daughter of mine with her trembling eyes, like those of the timid fawn, and O, that husband valiant as the royal tiger, you are both gone together, just as the high hopes and great efforts of men flee with the loss of their wealth."

²³ "Now without a husband and lately having also lost my daughter, and being thrown in a distant and barren land, I have become the most miserable and wretched of beings. Born of a low caste, I am cast out of all prospects in life. I have become a personification of terror to myself and a sight of horror to others. ²⁴ O, that the Lord has made me a widowed woman and subjected me to the insult of the vulgar and the snobbery of the affluent. Prostrated by hunger and mourning at the loss of husband and child, I rove constantly from door to door begging for alms for my support."

²⁵ "It is better that one who is unfortunate and friendless, or subject to passion and diseases, should die sooner than live in misery. Dead and inanimate beings are far better than the living miserable.

²⁷ The king seeing his aged mother-in-law mourning in this manner, offered her some consolation through the medium of her female companions. Then he asked that lady to tell him, "Who are you? What do you do here? Who was your daughter and who is your son?"

²⁸ She answered him with tears in her eyes. "This village is called Pukkasa-Ghosha. Here I had a Pukkasa for my husband who had a daughter as gentle as the moon. ²⁹ She happened to have a husband, beautiful as the moon, who was a king and chanced to pass by this way. By this accident they were matched together, like an ass finding by chance a pot of honey lying on her way in the forest.

Chapter 121 — The Reality of King Lavana’s Dream Explained; Proof of the Futility of Mind

¹ The tribal continued, “O lord of men! After lapse of some time, there occurred a famine in this place owing to the drought of rain, which broke down all men under its dire pressure. ² Pressed by extreme scarcity, all our village people scattered far abroad and they perished in famine and never returned. ³ From then on, O lord, we are exposed to utmost misery. We sit here lamenting in our helpless poverty. Behold us lord, all bathed in tears falling profusely from our never drying eyelids.”

Vasishta speaking:—

Then the wheel of fortune brought him back to his house, where he entered amidst the loud cheers and low salutations of the citizens. ⁸ In the morning the king appeared in his court hall and sitting there amidst his courtiers, he asked me, “How is it, O sage, that my dream has come to be verified in my presence to each item and to my great surprise? ⁹ They answered me exactly and to the very point all that I asked of them. They have removed the doubt in my mind of their truth, like winds disperse the clouds of heaven.”

¹¹ Rama said, “Tell me sage, how could the dream be verified? It is a mysterious account that cannot find a place in my understanding.”

¹² Vasishta replied:—

O Rama, everything is possible to the illusion of ignorance which shows the fallacy of a picture in a pot. Illusion represents the actual occurrences of life as dreams and dreams as realities. ¹³ Distance appears to be near, as a distant mountain seen in the mirror. A long time seems a short interval, as in a night of undisturbed repose. ¹⁴ What is untrue seems to be a truth as in dreaming one’s own death in sleep. That which is impossible appears possible, as in flying in a dream. ¹⁵ The stable seems unsteady, as in the false notion of the motion of fixed objects to one passing in a vehicle. The unmoving seem to be moving to one under the influence of his inebriation. ¹⁶ The mind infatuated by its interest sees all that it thinks upon within itself as exposed to its view. It sees things in the same light as they are painted in his fancy, whether they exist or not, real or unreal.

¹⁷ As soon as the mind contracts its ignorance by its false notions of “I” and “you”, it becomes subject to endless errors without beginning, middle or end. ¹⁸ It is notion that gives shape to all things. It makes a kalpa age appear as a moment and it prolongs a moment of time to a whole kalpa. ¹⁹ A man deprived of understanding believes himself to have become a sheep, and a fighting ram thinks himself to be a lion in his ideal bravery.²⁰ Ignorance causes the blunder of taking things for what they are not and falling into the errors of “I” and “you.” All errors in the mind produce errors in actions also.²¹ It is by mere accident that men come into possession of the objects of their desire, and it is custom that determines the mode of mutual dealings.

²² Lavana’s memory of his dream living in with the tribals of Pukkasa was the internal cause that represented to him the external picture of that place as if it were a reality.²³ As the human mind is liable to forget many things that it had actually done, so it is susceptible to remember those acts as true which were never done but merely had been thought upon in the mind.²⁴ In this manner, as long as I am thinking of having eaten something, it appears true to me even though I am really fasting. The thought that I have been in a distant country in a dream appears true to me while I think the thought.

³¹ Nothing is an entity or a non-entity and nothing can be said to exist or not exist unless we have a positive idea of its existence or a negative notion of its non-existence.³² All that we see in our error is as non-existent as oil in sand. In reality, the bracelet is nothing but a form of the substance of gold.³³ A fallacy can have no connection with the reality, just as the fallacy of the world with the reality of God, the fallacy of the ring with the substance of gold, and of the serpent with the rope. The connection or mutual relation of things of the same kind is quite evident in our minds.

³⁴ The relationship between gum resin and the tree is one of dissimilar union and affords no distinct ideas except that the tree contains the gum.³⁵ As all things are full of the Spirit, so we have distinct ideas of them in our minds. Minds are also spiritual substances. They are not like dull material stones which have no feelings.³⁶ All things in the world are intellectually true and real. Therefore we have their ideas impressed in our minds.³⁷ There cannot be a relationship or connection between two dissimilar things which may be lasting but are never united together. Without such mutual relation of things, no idea of both can be formed together.³⁸ Similar things being joined together form the wholes of the same kind, presenting one form and differing in nothing.³⁹ Consciousness being joined with an abstract idea produces an invisible, inner and uniform thought. Dull matter joined to another dull object forms a denser material object to view. But consciousness and material can never unite together owing to their different natures.

⁴⁶ Know, you who seek truth, that all things are identical with the entity of God. Renounce your knowledge of non-entities and the various kinds of errors and fallacies and know the one as all. ⁴⁷ Consciousness is full with its knowledge, so there is nothing lacking in us. Consciousness presents us everything in its circumference, just like imagination in its wide range shows us the sights of its air-built castles and everything beside. ⁴⁸ To Him there is no limit of time or place, but his presence extends over all his creation. Ignorance separates the creator from creation and raises the errors of "I" and "you."

⁵² The same Brahma causes the error of the reality of the exterior worlds, just as the underlying sea causes the error of waves on its surface. The same wood is mistaken for the carved figure, and common clay is mistaken for the pot made of it.

your body. ⁵⁹ Remain free from anxiety about the present, just as you are unconcerned about the future. Never be impelled by the impulses of your mind but remain steadfast in your trust in the true God. ⁶⁰ Be unconcerned with all and remain as an absent man. Let your heart remain detached from everything like a block of stone or a toy made of wood. Look with the spiritual light of your soul and see your mind as an inanimate thing.

⁶¹ As there is no water in stone or fire in water, so the spiritual man has no mental action, nor does the Divine Spirit have any. ⁶² If something unseen should ever come to do any action, that action is not attributed to the unseen agent but to something else in the mind. ⁶³ The uncontrolled selfish (unspiritual) man who follows the dictates of his fickle and willful mind resembles a man of the border land following the customs of outcasts or barbarians.

⁶⁴ Having disregarded the dictates of your vile mind, you may remain at ease and as fearless as an unconscious statue made of clay. ⁶⁵ He who understands that there is no such thing as the mind, or that he had one before but it is dead in him today, becomes as immovable as a marble statue with this assurance in himself. ⁶⁶ There being no appearance of the mind in any case, and you having no such thing in you in reality except your soul, then say, why do you vainly infer its existence for your own error and harm? ⁶⁷ Those who vainly subject themselves to the false apparition of the mind are mostly men of unsound understandings who bring destruction on themselves instead of the full moon of the pure soul.

We have considered long and we have never found anything like the impure mind in the pure soul.

Chapter 122 — Ascertainment of the Self or Soul

After the birth of a man and a slight development of his understanding, he should associate with the company of good and wise men. ² Except by the light of scriptures and association with the good and wise, there is no way to cross the river of ignorance that runs in its constant course flowing in a thousand streams.

³ By reasoning man is able to discern what is good for him and what he must avoid. ⁴ Then he arrives to that ground of reason which is known as good will, or a desire to do what is good and keep from what is bad and evil. ⁵ Then he is led by his reason to the power of reasoning, discerning truth from untruth and right from wrong. ⁶ As he improves in knowledge, he gets rid of his improper desires and purifies his mind from all worldly cares. ⁷ Then he is said to have gained that stage of knowledge which is called the purity of his soul and mind, and of his heart and conduct.

¹¹ Whether sitting inactive in samadhi meditation, or doing anything for himself or others, he must fix his mind to whatever produces real good to the world. His soul being cool by the faintness of his desires is habituated to do its duties without the knowledge of what it is doing. ¹² Truly, he who has subdued his mind has reached the contemplative stage of yoga meditation.

¹³ Thus one who has his mind dead in himself learns by practice of years to perform his duties by refraining from his thoughts of external objects. Such a one is said to have attained turiya or the fourth stage of spiritual elevation and has become liberated in his lifetime. ¹⁴ He is not glad to get anything or sorry to miss it. He lives without fear of accidents and is content with whatever he gets.

¹⁵ O Rama, you have known whatever is to be known by man. You certainly have extinguished your desire in all your actions through life. ¹⁶ Your thoughts are all spiritual and transcend the actions of the physical body, though you are in your embodied state. Do not give yourself to joy or grief but know you are free from decay and defect. ¹⁷ Spiritually you are a pure and bright substance that is omnipresent, ubiquitous and ever in its ascendancy, devoid of pleasure and pain, and of death and disease. ¹⁸ Why do you lament at or loss of a friend when you are so friendless in yourself? Being thrown alone in this world, whom do you claim as a friend of your soul?

¹⁹ We see only the particles of matter of which this body is composed. It exists and passes away from its place in its time. But there is no rising or falling of the soul. ²⁰ Being imperishable in yourself, why do you fear to fall into nothing? Why think of the destruction of your soul, which is never subject to death?

²¹ When a jar is broken in two, its emptiness is not lost but mixes with the air. The body being destroyed, the indestructible soul is not lost with it. ²² As the sunlight that causes the appearance of a river in a mirage is not lost at the disappearance of the apparent river, so the immortal soul does not perish upon dissolution of the frail body.

²⁴ There is no object of sense — whether visible, tangible, audible or of taste or smelling — that can affect the unconnected soul. ²⁵ All things and their powers are contained in the all-powerful and all-comprehensive soul. These powers are displayed throughout the world, but the soul is as void as the empty air.

³³ Thus the three worlds exist in the thought of the Divine Mind. It has sprung from the mind of God and it rests in its same state with the all-comprehending Mind.

³⁴ This Mind is called Brahma, who is the soul of all existence. He being known, the world is known also. As he is the knower of all, he gives us the knowledge of all things. ³⁵ This all pervasive Being is explained to us by the learned with labels like soul, intellect and Brahma, used both in scriptures and popular language. ³⁶ The pure notion that we have of an everlasting being, apart from all ideas from physical senses and impressions, is called Consciousness and soul. ³⁷ This Consciousness or Intelligent Soul is much more transparent than the ethereal sky. It is the fullness that contains the plenitude of the world as a disjoined and distinct reflection of itself.

⁴² Consciousness is irresistible in its course and roves about the solar path. It is the intellectual part that makes the man, and not the outer body. ⁴³ The soul called the inner person (purusha), whether it abides in the body or not, and whether it is intelligent or otherwise, never dies upon the death of the body.

⁴⁴ Whatever miseries you meet with in this transient world, they all appertain to the body and not to the intangible soul or consciousness. ⁴⁵ The intellectual soul is removed from the region of the mind. It is not approached by the pleasures and pains affecting the body and mind.

⁴⁷ If life is known to be frail and the living state to be a transient scene, then say, O Rama, what is lost by the loss of this prison-house of the body, and what is it that you mourn for? ⁴⁸ Think therefore, O Rama, on the nature of truth and mind and not about the errors of ignorance. Be free from your earthly desires and know the sinless soul to be void of all desires.

⁴⁹ The intellectual soul being tranquil and transparent, a mere witness of our doings without any doing or desire of its own, receives the reflection of the God without desire, just as a mirror reflects the images of things. ⁵⁰ The soul being, as said before, a translucent particle, reflects the images of all worlds in itself like a polished gem reflects the rays of light in its bosom. ⁵¹ The relation between the detached soul and the world is like that of the mirror and its reflections. The difference and identity of the soul and the world are of the same kind.

⁵² As the activities of living beings have a free play with the rising sun, so the duties of the world are fully discharged by the rising of consciousness. ⁵³ As soon as you get rid of your error of the substantiality of the world, you come to the consciousness of it being a vacuum resting in the spirit of God. ⁵⁴ As the nature of a lighted lamp is to spread its light all around, so the nature of mental philosophy is to enlighten us with the real state of the soul.

⁵⁷ At first the mind grows out from the Supreme Soul with all its activities and takes the nature of the lotus-born Brahma by its desire of creation. It stretches out a variety of worlds by its creative will, like fancied apparitions appearing before the imaginations of deluded children. ⁵⁸ Nonentity appears like an entity before us. It dies away at death and reappears with our new birth. The mind itself takes its rise from Divine Consciousness and displays itself in the substance of the Divine Soul, like waves playing on the surface of the waters of the deep.

BOOK IV
On Existence
(Sthiti Khanda)

This section discusses the place of the individual being (jiva) in the scheme of creation. Vasishta points out that the individual is none other than the ego sense or I known as ahamkara. This ego sense is the chief impediment to living with the knowledge of ones true self (atman sthiti). It is because of the ego sense that human beings fail to recognize themselves as they really are and suffer misery. It is only when the identification with the ego sense is extinguished that a seeker attains realization of the atman, the Supreme Soul.

The body and the senses are inert. It is the chidabhasa, the reflected light of the atman, that gives life to the body and makes the senses perform their functions. The objects perceived by the senses are not different from the atman. The perceiver and the objects perceived both originate from the atman and therefore are identical. When a person gains firm comprehension of this truth, he or she realizes that nothing exists apart from ones own atman or Self.

This atman is then realized as both the origin of this universe and its enjoyer as well. When this knowledge becomes firm a person is freed from the duality of happiness and sorrow. Chastity (bramacharya), constant practice (abhyas), and detachment (vairagya) are the means for attaining this knowledge, which in turn leads to a firm abidance in the Self (atman stithi).

Chapter 1 — Immaterial Spirit Cannot Have a Material Seed to Produce any Material World

Attend now Rama, to the subject of existence which follows that of production. This knowledge produces nirvana or utter annihilation of the self or soul.

² Know that the world of phenomena that exists before you, and your knowledge of ego or self-existence are only false conceptions of the formless nonexistence or emptiness. ³ You see tints of various colors painting the empty sky without any paint or their cause. This is only a conception of the mind without its visual perception, like the vision in a dream of one who is not in a state of sound sleep. ⁴ It is like a city in the sky built and present in your mind, or like shivering apes warming themselves by red clay thinking it to be red hot fire. It is pursuing an unreality.

¹⁶ Like a bubble of water, the world seems like something substantial to sight, but in reality all hollow within, and though appearing as juicy, it is without any moisture at all. ¹⁷ Bubbling worlds are as wide spread as the morning dews or frost, but take them up and you will find them to be nothing. Some think it is gross matter; others a vacuum. Some believe it is a fluctuation of thought or a false vision. Many believe it to be mere compounds of atoms.

¹⁸ I am partly of a material frame, my body and mind, but spiritually I am an empty immaterial substance. Although I can be felt by the touch of the hand, yet I am as intangible as a nocturnal fiend (an empty shadow only).

¹⁹ Rama said. “Sage, it is said that at the end of a great kalpa age, the visible world remains in its seed, after which it develops again in its present form. Please fully explain this to me. ²⁰ Are they ignorant or knowing men who think in these ways? Please sage, tell me the truth to answer my questions and tell me about the process of development.”

²¹ Vasishtha replied:—

Those who say that the physical world existed in the form of a seed at the final sleep of Brahma are altogether ignorant of the truth and talk like children to children. ²² Hear me tell you how contrary it is to right reason and how far removed from truth. It is a false supposition leading both the preacher and hearer of such a doctrine to great error and an egregious mistake. ²³ Those who attempt to show the existence of the world in the form of a germ in a physical seed maintain a very silly position, as I shall now explain unto you.

²⁷ That which is as minute as a nothing is equivalent to nothing. It could never be a physical seed, without which there could be no germ nor sprout. ²⁸ That which is more rare and transparent than the empty and clear sky cannot possibly contain the world with all its mountains and seas, and the heavens with all their hosts in its transcendent substratum.

²⁹ There is nothing in any way like a substance in the substantiality of that Being. If there is anything there, why is it not visible to us? ³⁰ There is nothing that comes of itself, and nothing material comes from immaterial spirit. Who can believe a hill proceeds from the hollowness of an earthen pot?

³¹ How can a thing remain with another which is opposed to it in its nature? How can there be any shadow where there is light, and how does darkness reside in the disc of the sun, or even coldness in fire? ³² How can an atom contain a hill, or anything exist in nothing? The union of a similar with its dissimilar is as impossible as that of shadow with the light of the sun.

³⁴ We see the same organs of sense and their sensations in all men in every country, but there is no uniformity in men’s understandings, nor can there be any reason assigned to this difference. ³⁵ Those who assign a certain cause to some event betray their ignorance of the true cause. What produces the effect except the very thing by some of its accessory powers?

Chapter 2 — There Is No Material Explanation for the World; It Exists only in Divine Consciousness

Now Rama who best knows the knowable, in order to dispel your belief in any separate existence of the world, all false fabrications of men, I will explain that there is only one pure and empty principle of Consciousness.

² If we assume there was the germ of the world in the beginning, it still leaves the question, what were the accompanying causes of its development? ³ Without cooperation of the necessary causes, there can be no vegetation of the seed, as no barren woman is ever known to bring forth an offspring in spite of the seed contained in her womb. ⁴ If it was possible for the seed to grow without the aid of accompanying causes, then it is useless to believe in the primary cause when it is possessed of such power in its own nature.

⁸ Therefore Rama, there neither is or was or ever will be a separate world in existence. It is the one intelligence of the divinity that displays the creation in itself. ⁹ So Rama, there being an absolute absence of this visible world, it is certain that Brahma himself is All throughout endless space. ¹⁰ The knowledge of the visible world is destroyed by destruction of all its causalities, but the causes continuing in the mind will cause phenomena to appear to the view even after their outward extinction. ¹¹ Elimination of phenomena can only result from the elimination of its causes, but if they are not suppressed in the mind, how can you eliminate the sight of phenomena? ¹² There is no other means of destroying our false conception of the world except by a total elimination of phenomena from our view.

¹³ It is certain that the appearance of the visible world is no more than our inner conception in the emptiness of consciousness. The knowledge of “I,” “you,” and “he” are false impressions on our minds like figures in paintings. ¹⁴ Mountains and hills, lands and seas, revolutions of days and nights, and months and years, the knowledge that this is a kalpa age and this is a minute and moment, and this is life and this is death, are all mere conceptions of the mind. ¹⁵ Knowledge of the duration and termination of a kalpa and great kalpa, and that of creation and beginning and end, are mere misconceptions of our minds. ¹⁶ It is the mind that conceives millions of kalpas and billions of worlds, most of which are gone by and many are yet to come. ¹⁷ The fourteen regions of the planetary spheres and all the divisions of time and place are contained in the infinite space of Supreme Consciousness.

¹⁸ The universe continues and displays itself serenely in the Divine Mind, as it did from before and throughout all eternity. It shines with particles of light of that Consciousness as the sky is full with the radiance of sunlight. ¹⁹ The inexpressible light thrown into the mind by Divine Consciousness shows itself as creation, which in reality is a baseless fabric by itself. ²⁰ It does not come into existence or dissolve into nothing. It neither appears nor sets at anytime but resembles a crystal glass with certain marks in it which can never be effaced. ²¹ Creations display of themselves in the clear Intellect of God, as the variegated skies form portions of the indivisible space of endless vacuum. ²² These are only properties of Divine Consciousness, as fluidity is that of water, motion of the wind, eddies of the sea, and the qualities of all things.

²³ This creation is only a compact body of Divine wisdom, and it is contained in Divinity as its component part. Its rising and setting and continuance are exhibited alike in the tranquil soul. ²⁴ The world is empty owing to its lack of any accompanying secondary cause. It is self-born, and to call it born or produced is to breathe the breath of a madman.

Chapter 3 — The World Is Eternal; There Can Be No Creation or Dissolution

² Vasishta answered:—

So it is said, O support of Raghu’s race, that after the universal dissolution, the lord of creatures rises by his predestination and at the commencement of a new creation. ³ It is by his will that the world is stretched out from his recollection and is manifested like an ideal city in the presence of Brahma, the creative power.

⁵ Rama asked, “Doesn’t the memory of the past continue in Brahma at his recreation of the world, like the former memory of men upon being reborn? Or are all past memories effaced from the minds of men by the delirium of death in their past lives?”

⁶ Vasishta replied:—

All intelligent beings, including Brahma and all others of the past age, who attain nirvana or extinction are, of course, absorbed in one Brahma. ⁷ Now tell me, my good Rama, where do these past memories and those-with-memories live when they are wholly lost at the final liberation of those-with-memories? ⁸ It is certain that all beings are liberated and become extinct in Brahma at the great dissolution. Therefore, without the persons who remember, there cannot be memories of anything.

¹¹ The spiritual body that is the attribute of God from time without beginning is the same as the manifestation of himself (viraja) exhibited in the form of the world or the microcosm. ¹² But the world is said to be composed of atoms, which compose the land and woods, the clouds and the firmament. But there are no atoms to form time and space, actions and motions, or revolutions of days and nights. ¹³ The atoms of matter that fill the world have other initial atoms (of spirit) which are inherent in them and cause them to appear in the forms of mountains and the like. ¹⁴ But these forms seeming to be conglomerations of atomic particles, and showing themselves to our vision as lighted objects, are in reality no substantial things.

to no end. ¹⁹ As sand on a rock, is attached but separable to it, and the grains are countless in number, so the orbs of the three worlds are like dust particles in mountainous body of Brahma. ²⁰ It may be possible to count the particles of ray scattered in sunbeams, but it is impossible to number the atoms of light emanating from the great sun of Brahma.

²¹ As the sun scatters the his light particles on the sparkling waters and sands of the sea, so does the Intellect of God disperse the atoms of its light all over the emptiness of the universe. ²² As the notion of emptiness fills the mind with the idea of the visible sky, so the thought of creation, which is identical to Brahma, gives us the notion of his intellectual sphere.

²³ To understand the creation as something different from Brahma separates man from him, but to take creation as synonymous with Brahma leads him to his joy. ²⁴ The enlightened soul, free from its knowledge of the physical seed and knowing Brahma alone as the fullness filling the vacuum of intellect, knows the Knowable in his inward understanding as being that same as what has proceeded from Him.

Chapter 4 — The World Exists in the Mind

The overthrow of the battery of the physical senses supplies us with a bridge over the ocean of the world. There is no other act whereby we may cross over it. ² Acquaintance with the scriptures, association with the good and wise, and practice of the virtues are the means whereby a rational and self-controlled man may come to know the absolute negation of phenomena.

³ I have told you, O handsome Rama, about the causes of the appearance and disappearance of the creation, resembling the heaving and resting of the waves of the sea of the world. ⁴ There is no need for a long discourse to tell you that the mind is the germ of the forest of acts and this germ being nipped in the beginning prevents the growth of the tree and frustrates the doing of acts which are its fruits. ⁵ The mind is all. Therefore by the healing of your heart and mind, you can cure all troubles and diseases you may incur in the world.

Chapter 5 — The Story of Shukra (Bhargava): Shukra Falls in Love with a Fairy Nymph

¹ Rama said, “Tell me sage, who knows all truths and is best acquainted with all that is past and is to come, how does the form of the world exist so vividly in the mind? ² Please explain to me by some illustration how this world appears as a visible object to the inner mind.”

³ Vasishta replied:—

The world truly is situated in the minds of men, just as it appeared in its firm and compact state to the ten bodiless sons of Indu. ⁴ It is situated in the same manner in the minds of men as the thought of King Lavana’s transformation of himself to a tribal (chandala) under the influence of sorcery. ⁵ It is in the same manner as Bhargava believed he possessed all worldly gratifications. Because true bliss has much more relation to the mind than to earthly possessions.

⁶ Rama said, “Sage, how did the son of Bhrigu come to enjoy earthly pleasures when he had been longing for heavenly joy?”

⁷ Vasishta replied:—

Rama, listen to my narration of the history of Bhrigu and Kala, whereby you will know how he came to possess earthly enjoyments.

¹⁸ She also, with her body shining like the fair full moon and shaking like a wave of the sea, became enamored of Shukra as she looked at his face. ¹⁹ Shukra then checked the impulse of his mind which the god of love had raised after her, but losing all power over himself, he became absorbed in the thought of his beloved object.

Chapter 6 — Shukra Imagines Indra's Paradise

Henceforth Shukra with his closed eyes continued to think of the nymph and indulge himself in his dreams of an imaginary kingdom. ² He thought that the nymph was passing through the air to the paradise of Indra, the god with thousand eyes. He imagined he was following her closely to the happy regions of the celestial gods. ³ He thought he saw the gods decorated with garlands of beautiful mandara blossoms on their heads, hanging resplendent as liquid gold. ⁴ He seemed to see the heavenly maidens with their eyes like blue lotuses regaling the eyes of their spectators, and others with their eyes as beautiful as those of antelopes playing with their sweet smiles all about.

There were celestial gods lying in the tree gardens beside the holy stream of the Milky Way (Mandakini), the heavenly Ganges. ⁸ These were the gods Yama and Indra, and the sun and moon, and the gods of fire and the winds. And there were the regents of the worlds, whose shining bodies shaded the luster of vivid fire. ⁹ On one side was Airavata, the warlike elephant of Indra, with the scratches of demonic weapons on his face and tusks gory with the blood of the defeated hosts of demons.

¹⁹ After all these sights, Shukra thought of making his obeisance to Indra, who was seated on his seat like another Brahma, the creator of the three worlds. ²⁰ Having thought so, Shukra bowed down to Indra in his own mind, as Indra was the second Bhrigu in heaven (i.e., a second father). ²¹ Indra received him with respect and having lifted him up with his hand, made him sit by himself.

²² Indra addressed him saying, “I am honored, Shukra, by your call. This heaven of mine is graced by your presence. May you live long to enjoy the pleasure of this place.” ²³ Then Indra sat in his seat with a graceful face that shone with the light of the unspotted full moon.

²⁴ Shukra, sitting by Indra’s side, was saluted by all the assembled gods of heaven. He continued to enjoy every joy there, having been received with paternal affection by the lord of gods and men.

Chapter 7 — Shukra Imagines Embracing the Fairy Nymph

Thus Shukra, being among the gods in the celestial city, forgot his former nature without passing through the pangs of death. ² Having halted awhile by the side of Sachi's consort (i.e., Indra), he rose up to roam about the paradise, charmed with all its various beauties.

¹⁹ Bhargava (Shukra) entered the white hall like Vishnu entering the milk ocean accompanied by his beloved Lakshmi who held his hand with her down-cast countenance. ²⁰ The apsara fairy graced Shukra like the lotus-stalk graces the bosom of the elephant. She spoke to him sweetly with words mixed with tender affection. ²¹ She told him in a sweet and delightful speech filled with expressions of endearment, "Behold, O my moon-faced lover! I see the curve of your bow is bent for my destruction. ²² Kama is shooting his arrows to destroy this lovelorn maid. Therefore protect me from him. I am so helpless from his rage that I have come under your protection.”

Saying so, the maiden fell upon his bosom with her body soft as a flower and her eyes turning like a small leaf in a gentle breeze. ³⁰ The loving pair fell into their trance of love in that happy grove, like a couple of playful bees creep into a lotus cup under the fair filaments of the flower shaking by the gentle breeze.

Chapter 8 — Reincarnations of Shukra

Thus the son of Bhrigu, in his daydream, believed himself to be enjoying heavenly pleasures. ² He thought of enjoying the company of his beloved, like the full moon accompanied by the evening star, bedecked with garlands of mandara flowers and inebriated with the drink of ambrosial draughts.

¹⁸ With their emaciated bodies and sad minds, they wandered about in the air, like birds without their nest. ¹⁹ Afterwards their disembodied minds entered into the network of lunar beams. Then, in the form of molten frost or rainwater, they grew as vegetables on earth. ²⁰ Some of these vegetables were prepared and eaten by a brahmin in the land of Dasarna, the confluence of ten streams. The substance of Shukra changed to the semen of the brahmin and then conceived as a son by his wife. ²¹ The boy was trained in the society of ancient sages (munis) to the practice of rigorous austerities, and he dwelt in the forests of Meru for a whole manvantara observing his holy rites.

Chapter 9 — Description of Shukra's Body during His Austerities

As Shukra was indulging his reveries in this manner, he passed insensibly under the flight of a series of years which glided over him in the presence of his father. ² At last his body withered away with age under the inclement sun, winds and rain. It fell down on the ground like a tree torn from its roots. ³ In all his former births his mind thirsted after fresh pleasures and enjoyments, just like a deer hunts from forest to forest after fresh vegetation. ⁴ He underwent repeated births and deaths in his wanderings in the world in search of its enjoyments. He seemed like something whirled about in a mill or a turning wheel, until at last he found his rest in the cooling beach of the rivulet.

⁵ Now the disembodied spirit of Shukra remained to reflect on his past incarnations in all the real and ideal forms of his imagination. ⁶ It thought of its former body on Mandara Mountain and how it was reduced to a skeleton of mere bones and skin by the heat of the sun and his austerities. ⁷ It remembered how the wind instrument of its lungs breathed out the joyous music of its exemption from the pain of action. ⁸ Seeing how the mind is plunged in the pit of worldly cares, the body seems to laugh at it by showing the white teeth of the mouth in derision. ⁹ The cavity of the mouth, the sockets of the eyes, the nostrils and ear-holes in the open face, are all expressive of the hollowness of human and heavenly bodies. ¹⁰ The body sheds the tears of its eyes in sorrow for its past pains and austerities, just like the sky rains after excessive heat to cool the earth. ¹¹ The body was refreshed by breeze and moonbeams, just as woodlands are renovated by cooling showers in the rainy season. ¹² It remembered how its body was washed on the banks of mountain streams by waterfalls from above, and how it was daubed by the flying dust and the dirt of sin. ¹³ It was as naked as a withered tree, and rustled to the air with the breeze, yet it withstood the keen blasts of winter like unshaken devotion in a person. ¹⁴ The faded face, the withered lungs and arteries, and the skinny belly resembled those of the goddess of famine who cried aloud in the forest in the howling of wild beasts.

¹⁵ Yet the holy person of the hermit, owing to its freedom from passions and feelings and its fervent tapas, was unhurt by envious animals and was not devoured by rapacious beasts and birds. ¹⁶ The body of Bhrigu's son was weakened by his abstinence and self-denial, and his mind was employed in holy tapas, as his body lay prostrate on the bed of stones.

Chapter 10 — Bhrigu's Anger Evokes Yama Who Describes Shuka's Many Lives

After the lapse of a thousand years, the great Bhrigu suspended his holy meditation, disengaged his mind from its meditation of God, and rose from his holy trance. ² He did not find his son lowly bending down his head before him, the son who was the leader of the army of virtues and who was the personified figure of all merits. ³ He saw only his son's body lying like a skeleton before him, like wretchedness or poverty personified in that shape. ⁴ The skin of his body was dried by the sun and his nostrils snored like a hooping bird. The entrails of his belly sounded like dry leather-pipes with the croaking of frogs. ⁵ His eye sockets were filled with new-born worms, and his rib bones had become like bars of a cage with the thin skin over them resembling a spider's web.

²³ Having appeared before the great sage, who was enraged as the raging sea, he soothed him to calmness, as after a storm, by the gentle breath of his speech.

Yama speaking:—

them. They are never moved with a motive for anything, and they are far from being moved without a cause. ²⁵ You sages observe the many rules of religious austerities, and we observe the endless and immutable laws of destiny. We honor you for your holiness and not from any other desire.

²⁶ Do not defame your righteousness by your rage, nor think to do us any harm. We are spared unhurt by the flames of final dissolution and we cannot be consumed by your curses. ²⁷ We have destroyed the spheres of the universe and devoured legions of Shivas, millions of Brahmas, and multitudes of Vishnus. Therefore, what is there that we cannot do?

²⁸ We are appointed as devourers of all beings and you are destined to be devoured by us. This is ordained by destiny herself, and not by any act of our own will. ²⁹ It is the nature of flame to ascend upwards and that of fluids to flow downward. It is destined for food to be eaten by its eaters, and that creation must be destroyed by us.

³⁶ Therefore, O sage, do not allow yourself to be so angry for your sorrow, but consider the course of events that befall humankind in its true light. ³⁷ We were not moved to any act by desire of fame or influenced by pride or passion. We ourselves are subject to destiny which predominates over all our actions. ³⁸ Knowing that the course of our conduct is subject to destiny appointed by Divine Will, the wise never allow themselves to be subject to darkness of pride or passion at our doings.

³⁹ That we must do only our duties at all times is the rule laid down by the wise Creator. You cannot attempt to remove it by subjecting yourself to ignorance and idleness. ⁴⁰ Where is that enlightened sight, that gravity and that patience of yours, that you grovel in this manner in the dark like the blind, and slide from the broad and beaten path laid open for everybody? ⁴¹ Why don't you consider your case as the sequence of your own acts? Why do you, who are a wise man, falsely accuse me like the ignorant?

⁴² You know that all living beings have two bodies here, of which one is known as the intellectual or spiritual body or mind. ⁴³ The other is the inert or physical frame that is fragile and perishable. The minute thing of the mind lasts until its liberation and is what leads all to their good or evil desires. ⁴⁴ As a skillful charioteer guides his chariot with care, so this body is conducted by the intelligent mind with equal attention and fondness. ⁴⁵ But an ignorant mind that is prone to evil destroys a good body, just like little children break their dolls of clay in sport.

⁴⁶ The mind is called the ruler of the body (purusha), and the working of the mind is taken for the act of the man. It is bound to the earth by its desires and freed by its freedom from earthly attractions and expectations. ⁴⁷ The mind is that which thinks in itself, “This is my body here, and these are the members of my body, and this my head.” ⁴⁸ The mind is called life because it has the living principle in it. The mind is one and the same and identical with understanding. It becomes the individual ego by its consciousness, and so the same mind passes under various designations according to its different functions. ⁴⁹ It called heart because of the body’s affections, and so it takes many other names at will. But all earthly bodies are perishable.

⁵⁰ When the mind receives the light of truth it is called enlightened intellect which, being free from its thoughts relating to the body, is set to its supreme joy. ⁵¹ Thus, as you sat absorbed in meditation, the mind of your son wandered from your presence to regions far and wide in the ways of its various desires. ⁵² He having left this body behind him in the mountain cave of Mandara, he fled to the celestial region, like a bird flies from his nest to the open air.

⁶¹ Your son also has passed many other births to which he was led to by his desire. He also had to undergo some births in lower animals. ⁶² He repeatedly has been a hunter (kirata) in the Vindhya Hills and at Kaikata. He was a chieftain in Sauvira and became an ass at Trigarta. ⁶³ He grew as a bamboo tree in the land of Keralas and as a deer in the outskirts of China. He became a serpent on a palm tree and a cock on a tamala tree. ⁶⁴ This son of yours had been skilled in mantras and he practiced them in the land of vidyadharas. ⁶⁵ Then he became a vidyadhara magician himself and worked his jugglery of taking ornaments from women. ⁶⁶ He became a favorite of females, just as the sun is dear to lotus flowers. Being as handsome as Kama, the god of love, he became a favorite among vidyadhara ladies in the land of gandharvas.

long night of repose and again commenced his creation of the world in all its various forms, ⁷⁰ the wandering spirit of your son was led by its desire, as if propelled by a gust of wind, to become a brahmin again and be reborn on this earth.

⁷¹ He was born under the name of Vasudeva as the son of a brahmin. He was taught all the Sruti scriptures among the intelligent and learned men of the place. ⁷² In this kalpa age he became a vidyadhara again and committed himself to the performance of his tapas on the bank of Samanga, where he is still sitting in his yoga meditation.

Chapter 11 — Yama (Time) on the Mind as the Cause Producing the World

Your son is still engaged in his rigorous austerities on the bank of the Samanga River, rolling with its loud waves on the beach, and the winds blowing and howling from all sides. ² He has been sitting still in his firm tapas with matted braids of hair on his head and beads of rudraksha seeds in his hand and controlling the members of his body from going astray.

³ O venerable sage, if you wish to know the dreams in his mind, you shall have to open your intellectual eye in order to pry into the thoughts of others.

⁴ Vasishtha said:—

Saying so, Yama, the lord of world who sees all at one view, made the muni dive with his intellectual eye into the thoughts of his son. ⁵ By his perception, the sage immediately saw all the incidents in the sequence of births in his son's mind as if they were reflected in the mirror of his own mind. ⁶ Having seen the mind of his son in his own mind, the muni returned from the bank of Samanga to his own body on Mount Mandara where it was left in its sitting posture in the presence of Yama.

⁷ Surprised at what he saw, the sage looked upon Yama with a smile. Dispassionate as he was, he spoke to the god in the following soft and dispassionate words.

Bhrigu speaking:—

¹¹ I knew very well that my son is not subject to death. Therefore I was struck with wonder to see him lying like a dead body. ¹² Thinking that the imperishable soul of my son was snatched by death, I was led to the brainless desire of cursing you on his untimely death. ¹³ For though we know the course of things in the world, yet we are subject to impulses of joy and grief owing to prosperity and adversity.

¹⁴ Moreover, to be angry with wrong doers, and to be pleased with those that act rightly, have become the general rule in the course of the world. ¹⁵ As we are subject to the error of the reality of the world, we labor under the sense of what is our duty, and what we must refrain from. But deliverance from this error removes all such responsibilities from us. ¹⁶ When we fret at death, without understanding its intention, we are to be blamed, of course.

¹⁷ You have made me acquainted with the thoughts of my son. I can see the whole scene on the bank of Samanga River.

¹⁸ Of the two bodies of men, the mind alone is omnipresent, the leader of the outer body of animated beings. The mind therefore is the true body that reflects and makes us conscious of the existence of ourselves, as also of the exterior world.

¹⁹ Yama replied:—

You have rightly said, O brahmin, that the mind is the true body of man. It is the mind that molds the body according to its will, just as the potter makes a pot at his pleasure.²⁰ The mind frames a form and gives a feature to the person that it did not have before, and it destroys one in existence in a moment. Imagination gives an image to an airy nothing, like children see ghosts before them in the dark.²¹ It is well known to everybody that the mind's power creates apparent realities out of absolute unreality, in dream and delirium, in misconceptions and fallacies and all kinds of error, like the sight of magic cities and talismans.

²² It is from their reliance on visual sight that men consider the material body to be the principal body, and they conceive the mind as a secondary or supplementary part.

²⁵ The variety of the mind's desires makes it perceive and produce varieties of things, like pots and pictures and the like.²⁶ The same mind thinks itself as many by the diversity of its thoughts, such as "I am weak," "I am poor," "I am ignorant," and the like.²⁷ The thought, "I am none of the fancied forms which I feign to myself, but of that form from where I am," causes the mind to be one with the everlasting Brahman by divesting it of the thoughts of all other things.

³⁶ Those who think they are surrounded by worldly affairs are like wide-stretching trees awaiting their fall by impending blasts of wind.³⁷ Those who wail aloud for being broken to pieces under the pressure of their misery are like the noisy waves of the sea breaking against the shore and shedding their tears in the form of watery spray.³⁸ But the waves are not of one kind, nor are they altogether entities or nullities in nature. They are neither small or large nor high or low, nor do these qualities abide in them.³⁹ Waves do not abide in the sea, nor are they without the sea or the sea without them.

They are of the nature of desires in the soul, rising and setting at their own accord.

⁴¹ As water is universally the same and transparent in its nature, so the all pervading spirit of God is pure and holy in every place. ⁴² This one and the same spirit is the body of God and is called the transparent Brahman. It is omnipotent and everlasting and constitutes the whole world appearing as distinct from it. ⁴³ The many wonderful powers that it contains are all active in their various ways. The different powers produce different ends and are all contained in that same body. All the natural and material forces have the Divine Spirit for their focus. ⁴⁴ Brahma was produced in Brahman just as the wave is produced in water. Male and female are produced from the neuter Brahman, changed to and forming both of them.

⁴⁹ Therefore it is Brahma that manifests itself in the visible world and is full with various forms, like the sea with all its waves and surges. ⁵⁰ It assumes to itself all varieties of forms by its volition of evolution or the will of becoming many. It is spirit that displays itself in itself and by itself, like seawater displays its waves in its own water and by itself. ⁵¹ As the various waves are nothing other than seawater, so all these phenomena are not different from the essence of the Lord of the world.

⁵² As the same seed develops itself in the various forms of branches and buds, twigs and leaves, and fruits and flowers, so the same almighty Seed evolves itself in the multitude of varieties of creation.

⁵⁶ Again, the Lord makes the mind produce matter only for its own bondage, just like He makes the silkworm weave its own cocoon for its own confinement. ⁵⁷ The mind of its own will forgets its spiritual nature and makes a strong prison house for itself, like the silkworm weaves its own coating.

⁵⁸ But when the mind by its own free will inclines to think of its spiritual nature, it gets its release from the prison-house of the body and bondage in the world, just like a bird or beast is released from its cage, or a big elephant let loose from his chains and the tying post.

⁵⁹ The mind gradually molds itself into the form which it constantly thinks upon in itself. The mind derives from within itself the power to be what it wishes to become. ⁶⁰ The long sought power when acquired becomes as familiar to the soul as the dark clouds that attend the sky in the rainy season.

⁶¹ The newly obtained power is assimilated with its recipient, just like the virtue of every season is manifested in its effect upon the trees.

⁶² There is no bondage or liberation of human soul, or of the Divine Spirit. We cannot account for the use of these words among mankind. ⁶³ There is no liberation or bondage of the soul which is the same with the divine. It is this delusive world that shows the immortal soul under the veil of mortality, or as eclipsed by and under the shadow of temporary affairs. ⁶⁴ The unsteady mind has wrapped the steady soul under the sheath of error, just like the silkworm's cocoon covers the dormant worm.

⁶⁵ All bondages that bind the embodied soul to earth are the works of the mind which is the root of all worldly ties and affections. ⁶⁶ All human affections and attachments to the visible world are born in and remain in the mind, although they are as distinct from it as the waves of the sea or moonbeams are produced from and contained in their receptacles.

⁶⁷ The Supreme Spirit is stretched out like one universal ocean agitated into myriads of waves and billows. Consciousness itself is spread out like the water of the universal ocean containing everything that is watery and earthly in its infinite bosom. ⁶⁸ All those who appear as Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva, and also they who have become gods and those who are called men and male creatures, ⁶⁸⁻¹ are all like the waves of the sea raised spontaneously by the underlying spirit. So are Yama, Indra, the sun, fire, Kubera and the other gods. ⁶⁸⁻² So too are the gandharvas and kinnaras, the vidyadharas and the other gods and demigods who rise and fall or remain for a while like the waves of the sea. ⁶⁸⁻³ They rise and fall as waves on every side, though some continue for a longer duration, like the lotus-born Brahma and others. ⁶⁸⁻⁴ Some are born to die in a moment, like petty gods and men. Others are dead almost as soon as they are born, such as insects and some worms.

⁷⁴ Some are born as trees and others have become like gods and demigods. Some are furnished with moving bodies; others are dissolved like water in the sea. ⁷⁵ Some are no less durable than many kalpas, and others return to the Supreme Spirit by the moonlike purity of their souls.

All things have risen from the ocean-like Spirit of Brahman, like its moving undulations. The mind is everyone's intellectual consciousness.

Chapter 12 — Yama on the Mistake of Individual Consciousness; Different Levels of Awareness

The consciousness of gods, demigods and men as distinct beings is quite wrong because they are in no way distinct from the infinite ocean of Divine Spirit of which they are all like undulations. ² Our false conceptions make us distinguish between ourselves and the Supreme Soul. The thought of being separate and apart from the Supreme Spirit is the cause of our degradation from our pristine holiness and the image of God, in which man was made at first and was infused with his holy spirit.

³ Remaining within the depth of the Divine Spirit, yet thinking ourselves to live without it, is the cause of keeping us in darkness on the surface of the earth. ⁴ Our consciousness of ourselves as Brahma, being spoiled by the various thoughts in our minds, becomes the root of our activities; while the pure consciousness of “I am” is free from all actions and energies. ⁵ The inner desire of the heart and mind becomes the seed of earthly actions which sprouts forth in thorny plants like the karanja, a handful of which fills the ground with thick weeds. ⁶ Living bodies lie scattered like pebbles on earth, rolling about or lying down with their temporary joy and grief in continued succession, owing to their ignorance of themselves.

Chapter 13 — Yama Explains to Bhrigu How Thoughts Create; They Go to Shukra

Among these various species of living creatures, which resemble the waves of the ocean and are as numerous as the plants and vines of spring,² there are some among the yakshas, gandharvas and kinnaras who have overcome the errors of their minds and have well considered everything before and after them, and who have become perfect in their lives, passing as the living liberated persons in this world.³ There are others among the moving and unmoving who are as unconscious of themselves as wood or stone. Many are worn out with error and are incapable of judging for themselves.

⁸ All living bodies are subject to pain and pleasure, but it is the mind which constitutes the body, and not the flesh.⁹ The body that is seen to be composed of the five elements to make flesh and bones is a creation of the imagination of the mind. It has no substantiality.

¹⁰ What your son had thought of in his mental body he found in that same body. He was not accountable to anybody for anything or whatever passed in his mind.¹¹ Whatever acts a man wills to do in his own mind, the same comes to take place in a short time. There is no other agency of anybody else required to bring them about.¹² Whatever the mind did in a moment and of its own accord, moved by its own will or desire, there is nobody in the world who has the power to do or undo at anytime.

¹³ The suffering of the torments of hell, the enjoyment of heavenly bliss, and the thoughts of birth and death are all fabrications of the mind that labors under these thoughts.¹⁴ What need I to tell more in the manner of writers of many words on this subject, other than go to the place where your son is situated?¹⁵ Shukra, having tasted the pleasure and pain of all these states at a moment's thought of his mind, is now seated in penance (tapas) on the bank of the Samanga River under spreading moonbeams.¹⁶ His vital breath, having fled from his heart, became like a moonbeam sparkling in a dew drop and entered the uterus in the form of virile semen.

¹⁷ Saying so, the lord of death smiled to think of the course of nature, and taking hold of Bhrigu's hand in his own, they departed together like the sun and moon.¹⁸ "O wonderful is the law of nature!" said Bhrigu slowly to himself, and then rose higher and higher, as the sun ascends above his rising mountain.

¹⁹ With their luminous bodies, they arrived at the spot of Samanga River and shone on high above the tamala trees below. Their simultaneous rising in the clear sky made them appear like the sun rising with the full moon over a cloudy horizon.

²⁰ Valmiki said:—

As the muni Vasishta was describing these things, the sun went down his setting mountain, and the day departed to its evening service. The court broke with mutual salutations to perform their evening rites and observances, after which they joined the assembly at the dawn of the next day.

Chapter 14 — Yama & Bhrigu Awaken Shukra from His Tapas; He Remembers His Past Lives

Yama and Bhrigu departed from the cave of Mandara Mountain and traveled towards the bank of Samanga River. ² As they descended from the mountain they saw a great light below proceeding from the bodies of the celestials sleeping in the tree groves of golden vines. ³ Birds were playing in sprays formed by cradling vines under the canopy of heaven. Lovely antelopes looked face to face, their eyes resembling blue lotuses. ⁴ They saw spiritual masters sitting on their stony seats upon elevated rocks, their bodies full of vigor and their eyes looking on the spheres with defiance.

¹⁵ Bhrigu saw his son on one of its banks, his body changed to another form and his features quite altered from his former state. ¹⁶ His limbs were stiff and his sense at a standstill as he sat with his mind fixed on steady meditation.

He seemed to have been there a long time to rest from the turmoil of the world. ¹⁷ He thought upon the course of the currents of the world that continually flow with successive joy and sorrow to man, who gets rid of them after his long trial. ¹⁸ He became motionless as a wheel after its long winded motion. He found his rest after his prolonged whirling in the whirlpool of the ocean of the world. ¹⁹ He sat retired like a lover reclined solely on the thought of his beloved object. His mind was at rest after its long wanderings. ²⁰ He sat in a state of uniform meditation without a shadow of division or differentiation, smiling with a cold apathy at all the pursuits of mankind. ²¹ Liberated from all concerns, released from the enjoyments of life, and free from the snare of desires and fancies, he rested in the supreme bliss of the soul. ²² His soul was at rest in the everlasting rest of God, just as a pure crystal catches the color of the gem that is next to it.

²³ Bhrigu saw his son in the calmly composed and awakened state of mind, freed alike from his thoughts of what was desirable and from his hatred of what was disgusting.

²⁴ Yama, seeing the son of Bhrigu, said to the father in a voice, hoarse as the sounding sea, “Lo there your son.” ²⁵ “Awake,” he said to Bhargava (Shukra), which startled him from his meditation just like the roaring of a cloud rouses a slumbering peacock from his summer sleep.

Then Shukra said as follows. ³⁷ “Blessed is the law of the Supreme Being that is without beginning or end and is known here below as destiny, and by whose power the world revolves like a two-wheeled carriage. ³⁸ I see my countless and unknown births from first to last, and the innumerable accidents to which they were subject, for an entire kalpa duration of the world. ³⁹ I have undergone great hardships and known prosperity also with the toil of earning. In different lives I have wandered, and I remember having roamed for a long time over the mountainous regions of Meru.”

⁴⁰ “I drank water reddened with the pollen of mandara flowers and wandered along the bank of the heavenly Mandakini (the Milky Way) filled with lotuses. ⁴¹ I wandered about mandara groves filled with flowering vines like gold. I wandered under the shade of the kalpa trees of Mount Meru, and in the flowery plains above and about it.”

⁴² “There is nothing of good or evil that I have not tasted or felt or done myself. There is nothing that I have not seen or felt or known in my past lives. ⁴³ Now I know the knowable and I have seen the imperishable one in whom I have my repose. Now I have rested after my toils were over and I have passed beyond the domain of error and darkness.”

⁴⁴ “Now rise, O father, and let us go see that body lying on Mandara Mountain which is now dried like a withered plant. ⁴⁵ I have no desire to remain in this place, or go anywhere of my own will. It is only to see the works of fate that we wander all about. ⁴⁶ I will follow you with my firm belief in the one adored deity of the learned. Let that be the desirable object of my mind, and I will act exactly in conformity with my belief.”

Chapter 15 — Shukra Laments His Original Body; Behaving in the Physical Body

Thus contemplating on the course of nature, these lovers of learning (Brighu, Shukra and Yama) moved with their spiritual bodies from the bank of the Samanga. ² They ascended into the sky and passed through the small openings in the clouds to the region of the spiritual masters, from where they descended to the lower world and arrived at the valley of Mandara. ³ There, on a cliff of that mountain, Shukra saw the dried body of his former birth lying covered under dark and dewy leaves of trees.

⁴ He said, “Here is that shriveled body, O father, which you had nourished with many a dainty food.

⁵ There is that body of mine that my wet-nurse had so fondly anointed with camphor, aromatic agalwood, and sandal paste. ⁶ This body of mine was used to repose on cooling beds made with heaps of mandara flowers in the airy spots of Meru. ⁷ This body of mine used to be so fondly caressed by heavenly ladies of time past. Now it is lying on the bare ground below to be bitten by creeping insects and worms. ⁸ This body of mine that was accustomed to ramble in the garden plots of sandalwood now lies like a dried skeleton on a naked place. ⁹ My body now lies impassive of the feelings of delight in the company of heavenly nymphs and withers away unconscious of the actions and passions of its mind. ¹⁰ Ah my pitiable body! How you rest here in peace, forgetful of your former delights in the different stages of life and unconscious of the thoughts of your past enjoyments and amusements. ¹¹ O my body that has become a dead corpse dried by sunbeams. You have become so hideous in your skeleton frame as to frighten me. ¹² I take fright to look upon this body in which I had taken so much pleasure before, now reduced to a skeleton. ¹³ I see ants creeping over that breast of mine which was formerly adorned with necklaces studded with starry gems. ¹⁴ Look at the remains of my body, now only a load of dry bones, but whose appearance of molten gold had attracted the hearts of beautiful women. ¹⁵ Behold the stags of the forest flying with fear at the sight of the wide open jaws and withered skin of my carcass, which with its horrid mouth frightens the timid fawns in the woods.”

¹⁶ “I see the cavity of the withered corpse’s belly is filled with sunshine, like the mind of man enlightened by knowledge. ¹⁷ My dried body, lying flat on a mountain stone, resembles the mind of the wise, abashed at the sense of its own unworthiness. ¹⁸ It seems to be emaciating itself like an ascetic sitting in a trance (samadhi) on the mountain, dead to the perceptions of color, sound, touch and taste, and free from all its desires and passions. ¹⁹ It is freed from the demon of the mind and is resting in its joy without any apprehension of the vicissitudes of fate and fortune, or fear of fall. ²⁰ The joy that attends the body upon calming the demon mind is not to be had from possession of any vast dominion of the world.”

²¹ “See how happily this body is sleeping in this forest, free from all its doubts and desires in the world, liberated from the network of its fancies. ²² The restlessness of the apish mind disturbs and troubles the body and is hurled down by its excitation like a tall tree uprooted from its bottom. ²³ This body, free from the impulses of the mischievous mind, is sleeping in its highest and perfect joy and is quite released from the jarring turmoil of the world clashing like the mingled roaring of lions and elephants fighting each other. ²⁴ Every desire is a fever in the bosom, and the group of our errors is like the mist of autumn. Mankind has no release from these except by the dispassion of their minds.”

²⁵ “They who have had the high-mindedness to lay hold on the tranquility of their minds have gone beyond the bounds of worldly enjoyments. ²⁶ It is by my good fortune that I came to find this body of mine, resting in these woods without its troublesome mind, and freed from all its tribulations and feverish anxieties.”

²⁸ Why did he have so much regret for his body begotten by Bhrigu, in disregard of all his other bodies and the pains and pleasures which attended upon them?”

²⁹ Vasishtha answered:—

Rama, the other bodies of Shukra were merely the creations of his imagination, but that of Bhargava, the son of Bhrigu, was the actual one, produced by the merit of his earlier acts.

³⁰ This was the first body with which he was born by the will of his maker, being first formed in the form of subtle air, then changed into the shape of wind. ³¹ This wind entered into the heart of Bhrigu in a flux for the vital and circulating breaths, and being joined in time with the semen, formed the germ of Shukra’s body. ³² The person Shukra received the brahmin sacraments and became his father’s associate until at last it was reduced to the form of a skeleton in course of a long time.

³³ It was because this was the first body that Shukra obtained from Brahma the creator that he lamented so much for it. ³⁴ Though dispassionate and devoid of desire as Shukra was, yet he sorrowed for his body, according to the nature of all being born of flesh.

³⁵ This is the way of all flesh, whether it be the body of a wise or unwise man. This is the usual custom of the world, whether the person was mighty or not. ³⁶ Those acquainted with the course of nature and those who are ignorant of it, like brutes and beasts, are equally subject to the course of the world, bound in the net of fate and liable to grief and sorrow. ³⁷ The wise and the unwise are on an equal footing with respect to their nature and custom. Only the difference in desire distinguishes one from the other. The lack of desires or the bondage to desires is the cause of their liberation or bondage in this world. Lack of desires is the great aim that distinguishes the great from the mean-mindedness of the base.

³⁸ As long as there is the body, there is the feeling of pleasure in pleasure and pain in pain. But the mind that is unattached to and unaffected by them makes itself show wisdom. ³⁹ Even great souls are seen to feel happy in pleasure and become sorrowful in matters of pain, showing themselves as wise in their outward circumstances.

⁴⁰ The shadow of the sun is seen to shake on water, but not so the fixed sun himself. So the wise are moved in worldly matters, though they are firm in their faith in God. ⁴¹ As the unmoved and fixed sun seems to move in his shadow on the wave, so the wise man who has rid himself of worldly concerns still behaves like the unwise in it. ⁴² He is free who has the freedom of his mind, although his body is held in bondage. But he labors in bondage whose mind is enslaved by error, though he is free in his body.

Chapter 16 — Shukra's Original Body Is Brought Back to Life

The god Yama interrupted Shukra's long lamentation and addressed him in words that sounded as deep as the roaring of a cloud.

² Yama said, "Now, O Shukra, cast off your body of the devotee at the Samanga River and enter this dead body in the manner of a prince entering his palace. ³ You shall perform austere penance with this your first born body and by virtue of that you shall become the teacher of the daitya race of giants.

Vasishta speaking:—

⁷ Saying so, the god vanished from before the weeping father and son, moving in the burning sky like the dispenser of light, the sun. ⁸ After the god had gone and gained his destined state among the gods, the two Bhrigus remained to contemplate on the inexplicable and unalterable course of destiny.

¹⁷ Bhrigu looked with affection on the newly risen old body of his son and smiled to see the resuscitation of the body that he had begotten. ¹⁸ He was pleased to know him as the son born of himself and to find his features impressed on him. ¹⁹ Thus son and father graced each other by their company, as the sun and lotus-lake rejoice to see one another after the shade of night. ²⁰ They rejoiced at their reunion, like a loving pair of swans at the end of the night of separation, and like a joyous couple of peacocks at the approach of rainy clouds. ²¹ The worthy father and son sat awhile to pause after all their works and troubles were at an end, then they rose up to discharge the duties that were at hand.

²² They set fire to the body of the Samanga River brahmin and reduced it to ashes. For who is there among earth-born mortals who should ignore the customary usages of his country?

Chapter 17 — The Difference between Shukra's Daydreams & Ordinary Daydreams

¹ Rama said, "Tell me sage, why do others' daydreams not have the same result as that of Bhrigu's son?"

² Vasishtha replied:—

The reason is that Shukra's body at first issued from the will of Brahma. He was born of the pure family of Bhrigu without being corrupted by any other birth. ³ The purity of mind which follows upon decreasing desires, is called its coolness, and the same is known as the stainless state of the soul.

⁴ Whatever the man of a pure and contrite spirit thinks in his mind, the same comes to take place immediately, like the turning of seawater turns into an eddy. ⁵ As the errors of various wanderings occurred to the mind of Shukra, so it is with everybody, as Bhrigu's son is an example.

¹⁶ Considered from a philosophical viewpoint, it will be found that the will or desire of each person produces the objects of his desire. ¹⁷ Everybody sees everything in the world according to the nature of the thoughts in his mind, then he dies with his wrong view of it. ¹⁸ In its idea, anything appears to exist which in reality is nonexistent, though it is apparent to sight. The existence of the world is like a lengthened dream. The visible world is a wide spread snare of the mind, like chains at the feet of an elephant.

²³ Rama asked, “Sage, how did the mind of Shukra receive the reflection of the shadowy world and its temporary movement? How did these fluctuations arise and remain in his mind?”

²⁴ Vasishtha said:—

Shukra was impressed with the thoughts of the world from his father’s lectures. These impressions remained in his mind like the future peacock resides in the egg. ²⁵ The world is naturally situated in the embryo of the mind of every species of living being. The world gradually evolves from the mind like shoots, sprouts, leaves and flowers from a seed. ²⁶ Everybody sees in his mind what his heart desires to possess, as it is in the case of our prolonged dreams.

²⁷ Know it this way, O Rama, that a partial view of the world arises in each person’s mind in the same manner as it appears in the mind in a dream at night.

²⁸ Rama said, “But tell me sage, whether the thought and the things thought of simultaneously meet in the mind of the thinker, or is it only the mind that thinks of the object which it never meets?”

²⁹ Vasishtha replied:—

The soiled mind cannot easily unite with the object of its thought, just as a dirty and cold piece of iron cannot join with a pure red-hot one, unless it is heated and purified from its impurity.

³⁰ The pure mind and its pure thoughts are readily united with one another, as pure waters mix together into one body of the same kind, which muddied water cannot do. ³¹ Lack of desire constitutes the purity of the mind, which is readily united with immaterial things of the same nature like itself. The purity of the mind leads to its enlightenment, and these being united in one leads it to the Supreme.

Chapter 18 — Incarnations of the Living Spirit

Living souls (jivatman) residing in the seeds of material bodies in all parts of the world differ from one another according to the difference in their knowledge of themselves. ² As long as there is no willingness or unwillingness connected with the identity of the living soul, it reposes in a state of rest, not unlike that of sound sleep (susupti). ³ But living souls addicted to their wishes identify with those wishes and find themselves born here below in their desired shapes.

¹¹ The souls of all living beings are subject to the three states of waking, dreaming and sound sleep. These states are caused by the mind and not by the body. ¹² The soul in its state as an individual person does not give rise to the body and passes under the triple conditions like seawater gives rise to the waves. ¹³ The living soul that has attained its intellectual state, beyond the conditions of sound sleep (susupti), is awakened to the knowledge of itself and is released from its rebirth, while the ignorant soul is subject to be born again.

¹⁴ Though knowing and unknowing souls attain the state of deep sleep and resemble each other in kind, yet the unknowing deep sleep soul that is not awakened to the knowledge of its spirituality is doomed to be reborn in the mortal world. ¹⁵ Omnipresent consciousness makes it pass into the mind of its next birth and exhibit itself in different forms in all its succeeding and subordinate regenerations. ¹⁶ These repeated births and regenerations are as endless as the many layers in the trunk of a plantain tree. The spirit of Brahma is adjacent to and pervades the whole, like the lofty leaves of the same tree.

¹⁷ The influence of the Divine Spirit is as cool as the cooling shade of a plantain tree. It is of its own nature and it is as unchangeable as the core of the plantain tree, in spite of the changes in all its outer coats and coverings. ¹⁸ There is no difference or diversity in the nature of Brahma the Creator in his repeated and manifold creations of worlds. He being the seed of the world shoots forth by his moisture into the form of the expanded tree of the world and becomes the same seed again. ¹⁹ So Brahman taking the form of the mind becomes the same Brahma by the memories of his mind, just as the sap of the soil makes the seed bring forth fruit which reproduces the same seed.²⁰ So the productive seed proceeding from Brahma displays itself in the form of the world. But as nobody can say what is the cause of the sap in the seed, so no one can tell why the spirit of God teems with productive seed (of Brahma) in it.

²¹ So no one should inquire into the cause of Brahma because his nature is inscrutable and undefinable. It is improper to say he is this or the other.²² One must not attribute causality to what is not the cause, or impute causation of material bodies to the immaterial spirit of God that is the prime and supreme cause of all. We must reason rightly regarding what is certain truth and not argue falsely about what transcends our knowledge.

²³ The seed casts off its seedy form and assumes the shape of fruit, but Brahman (the seed of all) contains the fruit (of the universe) in his bosom without laying aside the seed.²⁴ The seed of the fruit bears a material form, but Brahman the universal seed has no form at all. Therefore it is improper to compare the visible seed with the invisible Brahman who is beyond all comparison.²⁵ Brahman evolves himself in his creation and does not produce the world like fruit from seed. Therefore know the world is the empty heart of Brahman and is neither born nor unborn of itself.

³⁰ Brahma, who is as clear as the sky, cannot be perceived despite all our efforts because the sight of the sky as a visible thing cannot be compared to the invisible Brahman.³¹ Such a sight cannot present itself to us unless we can see the true form of God. But the sight of subtlest things is far from being visible to the beholder.³² We see only the outward sight because we cannot see the beholder of the sight. The beholder (God) is the only being in existence and all that can be seen is nothing.³³ God, permeate in everything that is visible, cannot be seen as a personal God or anything visible as a distinct thing. Because whatever the almighty King proposes to do, he instantly forms their notions and becomes the same himself.

³⁴ As the sweet saccharine juice of the sugarcane thickens itself into the form of the sugar candy, so the will of God becomes compact in the solid body of the universe.³⁵ As the moisture of the ground in spring becomes incorporated in plant life bringing forth flowers and fruit, so the energy of Divine Consciousness turns itself into the living spirit which soon appears in a physical form.

of salt on the seashore.³⁸ As the serum of the earth appears in various shapes, so the sap of consciousness produces an infinity of ideas and thoughts growing like trees in the wilderness of the mind.³⁹ These trees again shoot forth in branches and leaves, of which there is no end. So every other world is like a forest supplying its sap to innumerable plants, like thoughts in the mind.

⁵⁰ I consider the atoms of consciousness and the mind contained within the particles of the material body to be both empty and joined in one without causing a duality in their nature.⁵¹ Consciousness conceives many other atomic germs within itself under the influence of particular times, places, actions and circumstances that cannot be extraneous from itself.⁵² It is this particle of consciousness that displays creation like the vision of a dream before it. It is this conception that led the gods Brahma and others to the idea of their visible bodies, as it makes little insects think of their own bodies.⁵³ All that is displayed in this (outer) world is in reality nothing at all. Yet these living beings, though possessing the particles of consciousness in them, falsely conceive the duality of an extraneous existence.

⁵⁴ Some intellects (of particular persons) display themselves in their bodies and derive pleasure from their consciousness through their eyes and external organs.⁵⁵ Others look on outer objects as receptacles of consciousness from the belief that the all pervasive, inseparable and imperishable Intellect (Soul) must abide in each and every one of them.⁵⁶ Some men view the entire physical world within the body instead of the all pervading consciousness of Brahma as Vishwarupa, the Universal Form. These being hardened by long habit of thinking so are plunged in the gulf of error.⁵⁷ They wander from one error to another just like a man sees one dream after another. They roll about in the pit of their delusion, like a stone hurled down from a hill.

⁵⁸ Some persons rely on the union of the body and soul. Others who rely on the soul alone are placed beyond the reach of error. Many who rely only on their consciousness shine as rational beings.

⁵⁹ They who think in terms of other people's errors are to be considered as under the influence of false dreams in their sleep.

⁶⁰ God being the all-pervading spirit of nature is truly seen in the spirit of everybody. Because He is everywhere, his omnipresence is present in everything in all places. ⁶¹ God, shining as everyone's living soul, resides as the soul of each soul and mind whether directly or indirectly created. ⁶² One living being is born in another, and that again within another, like the layered bark of plantain trees that grow one under the other over the inmost core.

⁶⁸ As the perception of air comes by feeling and not by word of the mouth, so wisdom proceeds from the curtailing of desires. ⁶⁹ Ambrosia in a painting is no ambrosial food, fire in a picture is not burning flame, a beauty in a drawing is no beautiful maid, and wisdom in words only is lack of wisdom. ⁷⁰ At first wisdom serves to weaken our passions and enmity, then to uproot them at once, and at last it lessens our desires and endeavors and gives the appearance of holiness to its possessor.

Chapter 19 — Differences between Waking & Dreaming States

Brahma is the seed of life and remains as empty air everywhere. Hence there are many kinds of living beings situated in the world within the womb of universal Life.

² All living beings composed of dense consciousness and soul contain other living animals underneath, like the manifold layers of the plantain tree, and insects contained in the womb of earth.

⁸ Rama said, “Please sage, tell me the difference between the states of waking and dreaming. What are the states of waking watchfulness, waking dream and waking delusion?”

⁹ Vasishta answered:—

The waking state is that in which we have a sure reliance. Dreaming is the state in which we place no certain reliance and we believe it to be untrue.

¹⁰ Dream is something that seems like the waking state but lasts only for a moment. If an object is seen over a length of time and distance, it is said to be a waking dream or dreaming wakefulness. ¹¹ The state of waking dream can be of longer or shorter duration during which what we see appears the same at all places and times. ¹² Dreaming, as long as it lasts, is also like waking, but waking seems like a dream when the objects of its vision are not lasting. ¹³ A dream that is understood as an occurrence of the waking state is believed to be waking, but the inner consciousness of dreaming makes it a dream. ¹⁴ As long as one knows anything to be lasting before him, he believes himself to be waking. But no sooner is it lost to him, than he thinks himself to have been dreaming it.

¹⁵ Now hear how it is. There is a principle of life in the body that causes it to live. This vital element is an electric force called life (jiva chetana). ¹⁶ When the body is active with the powers of the mind, speech and the other members of action, its vital element is put into motion by the vital breath that it breathes. ¹⁷ This breath circulating throughout the body gives it the powers of sense and consciousness which have their seats in the heart and mind where the false conception of the world is hidden. ¹⁸ The mind circulates about the outer world, through the passages of sight and other organs, and sees within itself the forms of many changing shapes and figures. ¹⁹ As long as these forms remain permanent in the mind, it is called the waking state.

So far have I told you about the cause of waking, now hear me expound on the laws of sleep and dreaming.

²⁰ When the body is weary with action of its limbs, mind or speech, the living element becomes still and remains at rest with the calm and quiet soul residing within the body. ²¹ The internal actions of the body and mind being quieted and the motion of the heart being at rest, the living principle becomes as still as the flame of a lamp unshaken by wind. ²² The vital power ceases to exert itself in the members of the body and ceases to keep consciousness awake. The senses of sight and others do not act upon their organs, nor do they receive sensations from without.

²⁵ One who feels that his mind to be incapable of passion, who deals unconcernedly with every one, and who has reached the fourth stage of consciousness beyond the three states of waking, dreaming and sleeping, is said to be deadened in life (turiya).

²⁶ When the vital principle again comes to action after the enjoyment of its sound sleep, either in this or the other world, it takes the name of living element or mind or self-consciousness. ²⁷ This principle of life and thought, sees within itself the ebbs and flows of many worlds, just like a large tree and all its parts and productions are observed to be contained within the seed.

²⁸ When the breeze of the vital breath puts a slight motion to the element of life, it becomes conscious of its self-existence as "I am." The motion being accelerated, life finds itself flying in the air. ²⁹ When the vital breath is immersed in the fluids (phlegm) of the body, life gets the feeling of humidity in itself, as a flower perceives its own fragrance. ³⁰ When it is assailed by internal bile, then it has the feeling of its inner heat and sees all outward objects with its melancholy temperament. ³¹ When it is full of blood, it perceives a fiery redness in itself, like that of a red rock, or like the crimson red of the setting sun in the sky. ³² Whatever one desires to have, he sees the same in himself in his sleep, and this is by the force of his inner vital breath acting upon his mind as it does upon his outward organs.

³³ When the organs are not besieged by external objects that disturb the inner senses of the mind, the mind indulges itself reflecting upon many things. This is called its dreaming state. ³⁴ But when the organs are besieged by outward objects and the mind is moved by motion of vital breath (vayu) to their sight and perception, it is called the state of waking.

³⁵ Now, O great-minded Rama,! you have learned the inner process of your mind. But there is no reality in it or in this existent world which is subject to the evils of death, desire and destruction.

Chapter 20 — The Mind Is the Person, not the Body

Now Rama, I have told you all this in order to explain the nature of the mind to you, and for no other reason. ² Whatever the mind often thinks upon with a strong conviction of its reality, it immediately assumes that form, like an iron ball igniting from contact with fire. ³ Therefore the convictions of being or not being and of receiving or rejecting a thing depend upon the imagination of the mind. They are neither true nor untrue but merely fluctuations of the mind.

⁴ The mind is the cause of error, and it is the mind which is the framer of the world. The mind also stretches itself in the form of the universe (vishwarupa) in its gross state. ⁵ The mind is called the person (purusha, person, i.e., the ruler of the body) which, being brought under control and directed in the right course, produces all prosperity. ⁶ If the body were the person, how could the high-minded Shukra pass into various forms in his very many transmigrations? ⁷ Therefore the mind (chitta) is the ruler of the body (purusha) which is rendered conscious (chetya) by it. Whatever form the mind assumes to itself, it undoubtedly becomes the same.

⁸ So inquire into what is great, devoid of attributes and error, and which is easily attainable by everybody. Be diligent in your inquiry and you will surely succeed to obtain it.

Chapter 21 — Philosophy of the Mind Creating Its Own Reality; Different Schools of Thought

¹ Rama said, “Venerable sage who is acquainted with the mysteries of all things, I have a great question swelling in my heart like a huge surge of the sea. ² How is it, sage, that any foulness could attach to the mind when it is situated in the eternal purity of the infinite Spirit unbounded by time and space? ³ Again, as there is nothing, there never was anything, and there never will be anything other than the entity of the Holy One, how and from where could this foulness come in Him?”

⁴ Vasishta answered:—

Well said Rama! I see that your understanding is approaching the way to your liberation and exhaling the sweetness of the blossoms of the Nandana garden of paradise. ⁵ I see your understanding is capable of judging both deductively (reason) and inductively (observation) and is likely to attain that acme which was gained by the gods Shankara (Shiva) and others. ⁶ However, it is not yet the proper time and place for you to ask this question. It should be asked when I come to the conclusion of the subject. ⁷ You should ask this question when I come to the conclusion, and it will be demonstrated to you as clearly as the location of a place on a map placed in the palm of your hand.

¹⁴ The mind delights itself with thoughts of its desired objects and assimilating itself into their natures.

¹⁵ It receives the same form in which it delights and which it assumes to itself in its imagination.

²³ Minds of different casts follow different pursuits according to their particular inclinations. Minds employ themselves in the acquisition of wealth and virtues, desired objects and liberation according to whatever they think is their best choice.

²⁶ But the teachers of Vedanta doctrines acknowledge the mind as Brahma himself and preach peace and self-control as the only means to attain liberation. ²⁷ The authoritative assertion of Vedanta is that there is no other way to the salvation of the supposed mind, and it is an assumed dogma in other schools also. ²⁸ The Vijnavada philosophers also have ascertained and upheld peace and self-government as the leaders to liberation, but this too is an expression of their false understandings.

³² Mighty Rama, know that the mind is the source of all these rules and methods, just as the sea is the source of every kind of gem. ³³ There is no innate sweetness in sugarcane or bitterness in the neem leaf, both of which are sucked by insects. There no heat or cold inherent in the sun or moon. It is the intrinsic habit of the mind that makes the difference. ³⁴ Thus those who want to enjoy the unadulterated happiness of their souls should habituate their minds to assimilate themselves to that happy state, and they are sure to have the same. ³⁵ The mind having fled from the sphere of the phenomenal world becomes exempt from all its pleasure and pain, like a young bird with feathers flying in the air by casting off its eggshell and leaving its cage below.

⁴² The abstract meditation of the thoughtful yogi weakens the outward impressions, and by dissociating the soul from all external things, keeps it steady and calm in itself. ⁴³ The mind, by removing its attention from unreal sights, is inclined to the right view of things and produces clarity of understanding and a detached tranquility of the soul. ⁴⁴ The mind that regards neither realities nor unrealities and is unconscious to pleasure and pain feels in itself the delight of its singleness or unity.

⁴⁵ Application of the mind to unworthy thoughts and to the internal or external sights of things blocks the soul from tasting the sweets of its unity. ⁴⁶ The mind that is subject to endless desires is like the clear sky hidden by clouds. Such a mind wanders in the maze of doubt between truth and untruth, such as supposing the rope to be the serpent.

⁵⁶ The ignorant do not perceive the selfsame unity in all the things he sees in the world. They see everything in the light of the ideas they have imprinted in their minds. ⁵⁷ They also meet with results in the forms they have in mind, even though in reality they are not what they seem to be, nor are they entirely false. ⁵⁸ Man sees everything in the same manner in which he thinks it in himself. If his fancy is an elephant in the sky, he sees elephants in clouds. ⁵⁹ In his thought he believes these elephants are pursuing their mates, so it is the thought that gives the outward forms of things.

⁶⁰ Rama, repel your drowsiness and behold the Supreme Soul in your soul. Be like a bright jewel by repelling the shadows of all external things. ⁶¹ It is impossible, O Rama, that one so enlightened as you will receive the reflection of the world as dull matter, like others do. ⁶² Being certain of its immateriality. Never taint your mind with its outward coloring or the knowledge of its reality, but know the reflection of the world is in no way distinct from the Supreme Spirit. ⁶³ Keep in your mind that Being who is without beginning or end, and meditate on the spirit in Spirit. Do not let the reflections of your mind stain the pure crystal of your soul. ⁶⁴ Be on your guard so you never allow the reflections of your mind to taint the clear crystal of your soul. Remain unmindful of phenomena and do not regard any worldly desire.

Men of sound judgment are free from mental disturbance and are perfect in their mastery over themselves by restraining the flight of the mind and fastening it to its inner awareness. ² They swerve from the sight of phenomena as unworthy of their notice. They seek knowledge of their chief good. They behold the all-seeing God in their mental and external sights and have no perception of unintelligent phenomena.

¹⁰ When the disturbances of doubts are settled and the wandering of curiosity is over, then the full moon of internal fullness sheds its light over the mind. ¹¹ As the mind's true greatness appears after it sets from the height of its dignity and high-mindedness, so it begins to have its equanimity in a state resembling the calm sea after a storm. ¹² As long as the shadow of concerns hangs over the mind, it is darkened and stupefied and broken in the heart, until the sun of renunciation rises to dispel its gloom.

¹⁵ What more shall I say on this subject, other than he who knows the knowable (God) has his mind expanded like the sphere of heaven which has no beginning nor end. ¹⁶ The mind enlightened by reasoning is as exalted in its nature as to take pity on even the gods Hari, Hara, Brahma and Indra.

²⁰ But the spiritual body is neither born nor dies in this world. It is not affected by the decoration or loss of the material body but remains unchanged as the emptiness of a pot, both when it exists and when it is broken to pieces.

²¹ As understanding rises with its cooling moonbeams within us, it dispels the mist of false desires rising before us like a mirage in a dreary desert. ²² The spectacle of the world presents its dusky appearance to our view only as long as we do not consider the questions, "What am I, and what are all these about me?"

²³ He sees rightly who sees his body as an apparition of his error and the abode of all evils, and that his body does not serve the spiritual meditation of his soul and his maker. ²⁴ He sees rightly who sees that his body is the source of all the pain and pleasure which afflict at different times and places, and that the body does not answer his purpose of spiritual edification.

²⁵ He sees rightly who sees the One Ego pervading infinite space and time as the source of all accidents and events that constantly take place in them. ²⁶ He knows rightly who knows the Ego to be as minute as a millionth or billionth part of the point of a hair, and pervading the entire infinity of space and eternity of time. ²⁷ He perceives rightly who perceives the Universal Soul to permeate all the various objects of his sight and knows them as sparks of the Light of Consciousness. ²⁸ He perceives rightly who perceives within himself the omnipotence of the infinite Spirit present in all states and conditions of beings, and the same Consciousness to abide in and preside over all. ²⁹ He understands rightly who understands by his wisdom that he is not his body that is subject to diseases, dangers, fears and anxieties, and to the pain and pangs of old age and death.

³⁰ He understands rightly who understands his soul as stretching above and below and all about him, whose magnitude has no bounds nor equal to it. ³¹ He knows full well who sees his soul as a string to which all things are strung like pearls on a necklace, and that it is not the mind or heart that is seated in the brain or bosom.

³⁹ He is the discerning man who has weakened his estimation and dislike of what is desirable and disgusting to him in the world, and who sees the world as full of the essence of that Being whose nature is beyond comprehension and conception. ⁴⁰ That man of great soul is a great god whose soul, like the all-pervading sky, extends over all and penetrates through every state of existence without receiving the color dye of any.

⁴¹ I bow down to that great soul who has passed beyond the states of light, darkness and fancy. ⁴² I bow down to Shiva of transcendental understanding whose faculties are wholly engrossed in meditation of the Eternal Being who presides over the creation, destruction and preservation of the universe, and who is manifest in all the various wonderful and beautiful grandeurs of nature.

Chapter 23 — The Wonders within the Realm of the Body

The man liberated in this life and settled in the Supreme state of joy is not tarnished by reigning over the realm of his body and turning about like a wheel. ² The body of a wise man is like a principedom to him, calculated for his benefit and of no disadvantage. It is comparable to the dwelling of a holy hermit for the consummation of his efforts and liberation.

³ Rama said, “O great sage, how can you call the body to be the dominion of a man, and how can a yogi have his princely joy in it?”

⁴ Vasishta replied:—

Beautiful is this city of the body. Being enlightened by the light of the mind, it is filled with every good to mankind and it produces endless blessings in both worlds.

The nine openings of the body serve as so many windows for the citizens to breathe. ¹³ There is the open mouth like an open doorway, with its teeth slightly seen as its gratings. The tongue moving in the door way like a naked sword is like the tongue of goddess Kali, thrust out when she devours her food.

The heart is the garden-ground where passions promenade like ladies. ¹⁶ Here understanding is bound in chains like a prisoner, and the organs of sense are let loose as monkeys to play about.

The face is like a flower garden. Its smiles are its blooming blossoms.

¹⁷ The life of the man who knows the proper use of his body and mind is prosperous in everything. It is attended by happiness and advantages and no disadvantage whatever. ¹⁸ This body is the source of infinite trouble to the ignorant, but it is the fountain of infinite happiness to the wise man.¹⁹ Its loss is no loss to the wise, but its continuance is the cause of continued happiness to the wise man.²⁰ The body serves as a chariot to the wise who can travel everywhere by riding in it. The body of a wise man can produce and procure everything conducive to his welfare and liberation.

²³ A wise man reigns over the dominion of his body without any pain or trouble in the same manner as one remains the lord of his house without any anxiety or disturbance.²⁴ He is not addicted to licentiousness like a high spirited horse. He is not subject to greed after some poisonous plant, so he does not part with the auspicious daughter of his prudence.

³⁸ The sage, like the sun, looks down from above the earth's atmosphere on the hosts of mortals who have been cut down by misery, like heaps of brambles and branches scattered in the woods.³⁹ The sage has full satisfaction of his desires and full possession of his best riches. He shines like the full moon without fear of waning. ⁴⁰ The worldly enjoyments of the wise do not tend to spoil their nature, just as the poisonous drink of Shiva was not capable of doing him any injury.

⁴⁴ As our eyesight falls indifferently on all objects about us, so the wise man looks unconcernedly upon all of life's things and transactions. ⁴⁵ The wise man is self sufficient in all conditions of life. He neither rejects the earthly blessings that are presented to him, nor does he long or strive hard for what is denied to him. ⁴⁶ The regret of longing after what one does not possess, like the fear of losing what he possesses, does not trouble the mind of the wise, like the plumes of a dancing peacock do not shake the unshaken mountain.

⁵⁸ You must chastise your reprobate members and mind with the writhing of your hands gnashing of your teeth and twisting of your limbs and body. ⁵⁹ The brave and wise man who intends to overcome his enemies must first of all strive to subdue the internal enemies of his own heart and mind and the members of his body. ⁶⁰ On this earth, those men are reckoned the most prosperous and best disposed in their minds who have the courage to govern their minds instead of being governed by them.

⁶¹ I revere those pure and holy men who have quelled the huge and crooked serpent of their minds, lying coiled in the cave of their hearts, and who rest in the inner tranquility and serenity of their souls.

Chapter 24 — The Non-Entity of the Mind

The vast domain of death in the region of hell is full with the furious elephants of our sins and the uncontrollable enemies of the senses with the arrows of desires. ² Our senses, being the sources of all misdeeds and wicked actions, are our invincible enemies. They are the ungrateful miscreants working against the body in which they have found their refuge.

¹⁰ So long as the demons of our desires infest the region of our hearts, we are unable to bring the mind under the subjugation of our knowledge of the true One.

¹¹ He is the faithful servant who acts according to the will of his master. He is the true minister who does good services to his prince. He is the best general who has command over the forces of his own body, and the best understanding is guided by reason. ¹² The wife is loved for her endearments and the father is revered for his protection of the child. A friend is valued by his confidence, and the mind for its wisdom.

¹³ The mind is called our father because it enlightens our understanding with the light of the scriptures, and for leading us to perfection by losing itself in the Supreme Spirit. ¹⁴ The mind that has well observed and considered all things, that is enlightened and firm in its belief and is employed in laudable pursuits, is truly a valuable gem within the body. ¹⁵ The mind as a counselor of our good teaches us how to cut down the tree of our transmigration and produce the tree of our future bliss.

¹⁶ Such is the gem of the mind, O Rama, unless it is soiled by the dirt and filth of sin and vice. Then it requires washing and cleaning with the water of reason in order to throw its light on you. ¹⁷ Be not dormant to cultivate reason as long as you abide in the dark abode of this world. Do not thrust yourself to every accident that awaits upon ignorant and unreasonable men. ¹⁸ Do not overlook the mist of error that spreads over this world of illusion, abounding with multitudes of mishaps and mischief.

¹⁹ Try to cross the wide ocean of the world by riding on the strong boat of your reason, using your discrimination to chart the right course against the currents of your sensual desires. ²⁰ Know your body to be a frail flower and all its pleasure and pain to be unreal. So never take pleasure and pain for realities, as in the instance of the snare, snake and the matting, but remain above sorrow for anything as in the instance of Bhima and Bhasa.

²¹ O high minded Rama, give up your misjudgments of reality and of yourself, and of this and that thing. Direct your understanding to the knowledge of the Reality which is beyond all these. Then, by forsaking your belief and reliance in the mind, continue in your course of eating and drinking as before.

O intelligent Rama, who shines as the delight of mankind in this world and endeavors to attain your chief good by the accomplishment of your best objects, ² do not let the example of the demons Dama the snare and Byala the snake apply to your case. Try to extricate yourself from vain sorrowing by the lesson of fortitude as given in the story of Bhima and Bhasa.

³ Rama asked, “What is that parable of the snare and the snake which you say must not apply to my case? Please tell me in order to remove the sorrows of my mind and of all mankind. And what is that example of fortitude by Bhima and Bhasa that I should imitate in order to rid all earthly sorrow?”

⁵ Please tell me and enlighten me with your purifying words, like the roaring of rainy clouds serves to alleviate the summer heat of peacocks.”

⁶ Vasishta replied:—

Rama, hear me relate both of these stories so that you may derive the benefit of learning from their examples.

¹⁰ The beauties in his harem vied with the celestial dames in their charming strains. The trees of his pleasure garden were shaded by an awning of bright moonbeams on high. ¹¹ Blue lotuses blooming in his bedroom made the blue eyed maids of his court blush. Swans in the lakes cackled about the beds of golden lotuses in them. ¹² The high branches of golden plants bore blossoms of artificial lotuses, and rows of karanga trees dropped down showers of mandara flowers on the ground.

¹⁷ The dark night of the subterranean dwelling was illuminated by a hundred moon-lights like the starry heaven, and he chanted his martial songs before his idol deity. ¹⁸ His magical elephant drove away Indra’s Airavata, and his inner apartment contained a hoard of precious treasures from the three worlds.

¹⁹ All wealth, prosperity, grandeur and dignity paid their homage to him. The whole host of demons honored him as their commander. ²⁰ The protection of his arms gave shelter to the whole body of demons. He was the receptacle of all sound judgment and the reservoir of every kind of treasure.

³⁷ They were beings without previous births and devoid of changing desires. The lack of their prior acts made them move about as freely as spiritual beings in one uniform tenor of their course. ³⁸ These were not born like men from the seeds of their previous acts with solid and substantial bodies. They were mere artificial forces and airy forms, copies of images in the demon Sambara's mind. ³⁹ Being born in this way, they followed events as they happened like blind sheep. Just like a boy moves his limbs when he is not in sound sleep, these three demon generals performed actions devoid of subtle karmic impressions and self or egoism.

⁴⁰ They did not know the sudden attack of the enemy on them or their attack on the enemy. ⁴¹ They did not know running away from battle. They did not know birth or death, victory or defeat, or war as a matter of fact. ⁴² But they attacked the enemy in front of them with blows that turn even mountains into dust.

⁴³ Sambara was pleased with them. He was confident that with their help he would defeat the enemy.

Chapter 26 — Description of Battle between Gods and Demons

So thinking, the chief of the demons dispatched his generals Dama, Byala and Kata to lead his armies to destroy the gods upon earth. ² The demonic army rose out of the foaming sea and infernal caverns in full armor and wielding fiendish arms. Then bursting forth with hideous noise, the demon soldiers soared aloft with their huge bodies like mountains flying on high. ³ Their monstrous and mountainous bodies hid the disc of the sun in the sky, and their stretching arms smote him of his rays. They increased in number and size under the leadership of Dama, Byala and Kata.

gathering clouds, and thickened clouds, so dense a fist could grab them, were heavy and slow in their motion. ²¹ Broken weapons repelled by war-chariots hit against the hills and emitted a rattling noise from their inner hollowness, like the discordant sounds of a chorus. ²² Mountain forests were set on fire by fiery weapons, and burning rocks melted down their lava with a noise as dreadful as that of volcanic Mount Meru with its melting gold and blazing with the brightness of the twelve suns of the zodiac.

⁴⁰ Furious flames of heavenly fire burned the bodies of the infernal hosts who, in their turn, quenched the flames with water-spouts drawn out of an underground deep. ⁴¹ Enraged demons flung up and hurled huge hills against the gods' falling fires which, like a wild conflagration, melted the hard stones to liquid water. ⁴² The shadow of the demons' weapons spread a dark night in the sky which the gods destroyed by the artificial flame of lightning, blazing like so many suns in heaven. ⁴³ The fire of the lightning dried up the waters of the raining clouds, and the clashing of arms emitted a shower of fire on all sides. ⁴⁴ The shower of thunder-arms broke down the battery of mountain ramparts, and the sleep-weapon of slumber dispelled by that of its counteraction. ⁴⁵ Some bore the sawing weapon, while others held the Brahmastra, the invincible weapon of warfare that dispels the darkness of the field by its flashing.

Chapter 27 — Brahma Advises the Defeated Gods to Foster the Demons' Ego

As the war of the gods and titans raged violently on both sides, and their bodies were cut by the others' weapons, ² streams of blood gushed out from their wounds like waterfalls in the Ganges basin. Gods caught into the snares of demigods groaned and roared aloud like lions.

³ Byala with his stretching arms was crushing the bodies of the gods. Kata was harassing them in their unequal challenge with them. ⁴ The demons waged their battle with the rage of the midday sun, and put to flight the Airavata elephant of Indra, the leader of the gods. ⁵ Gods dropped down with their bodies gored with wounds and spouting with blood. Their armies fled on all sides like the currents of a river overflowing and breaking down its bank.

¹¹ The gods bowed down before Brahma and complained of the danger that was brought upon them by Sambara through his generals Dama, Byala and Kata, whose doings they fully described to him. ¹² The judging Brahma, having heard and considered all this, delivered the following encouraging words to the host of gods before him.

¹³ Brahma said:—

“You will have to wait another hundred thousand years before you can destroy Sambara under the arms of Hari (Vishnu) in an open engagement. ¹⁴ Today you have been forced to flee by the demonic Dama, Byala and Kata who have been fighting with their magical arts. ¹⁵ They are elated with pride at their great skill in warfare, but it will soon vanish like the shadow of a man in a mirror.

²⁴ If there is anything in the world beside the one Self that may be yours or worth your desire, you may long to have it. But all things being only parts of the universe, there is nothing particular for anyone to have or seek. ²⁵ Reliance on earthly things is the source of unhappiness, while our disinterest with all things is the fountain of everlasting joy.

²⁶ As long as the gods are independent of worldly things, they must remain invincible. But if they are dependent on them, they will perish like a swarm of gnats in the flame of a wildfire. ²⁷ It is man's inner desire that makes him miserable in himself and allows him to become subdued by others. Otherwise, worm-like man is as firm as a rock. ²⁸ Where there is any desire in the heart, it is thickened and hardened in time, just like everything in nature increases in its bulk in time. But not so things that are not in existence, such as the lack of desires.

³⁵ You gods need not bear the burden of your weapons anymore, nor toil and moil in the field of war any longer, but try your best to inflame the pernicious greed of your enemies to the utmost. ³⁶ Know, O chief of the gods, that no arm or weapon or any program or policy is able to defeat the enemy until they defeat themselves by their lack of patience and excess of their greed.

⁴¹ The path of this world is either even or rugged according to the good or restless desires of our hearts. The heart is like the sea in its calm after storm, when its waves are still as our subsided desires, or as boisterous as the stormy sea with our increasing greediness.

Chapter 28 — Description of Renewed Battle between Gods & Demons

Saying so, the god Brahma vanished from the sight of the gods, just as the wave of the sea retires and mixes with its waters after having dashed and crashed against the shore.

² The gods, having heard Brahma's words, returned to their respective homes as the breeze bearing the lotus fragrance blows it to the forests on all sides. ³ They stayed in their delightful houses for some days, like bees resting themselves in the cells of flowers after their wanderings. ⁴ Having refreshed and invigorated themselves over the course of time, they gave the alarm of their rising with the beating of their drums, sounding like the peals of the last day.

¹² Serpentine weapons flew with their mountainous shapes in the ocean of the sky. Their eyes flashed with their venomous heat, burning with the fire of the twelve suns on the last day of desolation. ¹³ A hydraulic engine sent forth floods of weapons, whirling like whirlpools and sounding loud as the rattling thunder, sweeping hills and rocks in their currents. ¹⁴ Stone missiles thrown by the garuda engine to the gods' aerial battlefield emitted at intervals water and fire, sometimes shining as the sun, and at others becoming altogether dark. ¹⁵ Garuda weapons flew and roared in the sky, and firearms spread a conflict of burning hills above. The gods' towers burned and fell upon the earth, and the world became as unendurable as in its conflagration on the last day.

²⁷ The sky appeared as an ocean of illusion burning with the bodies of warriors like flaming trees, and rolling in surges of gods' and demons' dead bodies floating on it like mountains. The edges of the earth seemed like forest made by the clubs, lances, spears and many other weapons constantly falling upon them. ²⁸ The horizon was surrounded by the big and impenetrable line of demonic bodies resembling the chain of Mount Sumeru encircling the earth. The earth itself resembled an ocean filled with the mountainous bodies of fallen warriors and towers of celestial cities blown down by the winds.

Chapter 29 — Defeat of the Demons

In this manner, the energetic and murderous demons repeated their attacks and waged many wars with the gods. ² They carried on their warfare sometimes by fraud and often by their aggressiveness, and frequently after a truce of open war was made with the gods. They sometimes fled, renewed their strength, then attacked again in the open field. Other times they lay in ambush, concealed in their underground caves. ³ Thus they waged their battle against the celestials for five and thirty years, by repeatedly flying and withdrawing from the field, then reappearing with their arms. ⁴ They fought again for five years, eight months and ten days, shooting their firearms, trees and stones and thunders upon the gods.

²¹ What more needs to be said? The demons were overpowered by the gods and fled from the battlefield in fear of their lives. ²² When the demons Dama, Byala, Kata and others were repulsed by the prowess of the gods and fled cowardly in different ways, ²³ the remaining demons fell down before the gods and fled from the air on all sides, like the falling stars of heaven at the end of a kalpa age.

Chapter 30 — The Subsequent Lives of Dama, Byala & Kata

Upon destruction of the demons, the gods were exceedingly joyous, but Dama and the other demon leaders became immersed in sorrow and grief. ² Sambara was full of wrath, and his anger was ignited like an all-destroying fire against his generals, whom he called aloud by their names and said, “Where are they?” ³ But they had fled from their abodes for fear of his anger.

Dama, Byala, and Kata hid themselves in the seventh sphere of the infernal regions. ⁴ There dwelt the horrid instruments of death, formidable as their lord Yama himself, and who were glad with their duty of guarding the abyss of hell. ⁵ The fearless guards of hell received them into their favor, and having given them shelter in the hell-pit, gave them their three maiden daughters in marriage. ⁶ In their company, they passed a period of ten thousand years and gave a free vent to their evil desires up to the end of their lives. ⁷ Their time passed away in such thoughts as these, that, “This is my consort and this my daughter, and I am their lord.” They were bound together with ties of mutual affection as strong as the chain of death.

¹² The evil desires and wicked propensities that they contracted in the company of the hellish crowd caused their reincarnation in the forms of Kiratis to carrying on their slaughters and atrocities like Yama’s thralls. ¹³ Getting rid of that birth, they were next born as ravens, and then as vultures and falcons of mountain caves. ¹⁴ Then they were transformed into the forms of hogs in the land of Trigarta, and then as mountain rams in Magadha, and afterwards as heinous reptiles in caves and holes. ¹⁵ Thus, after passing successively into a variety of other forms, they are now lying as fish in the woodland lakes of Kashmir. ¹⁶ Being burnt in hellfire at first, they now have their temporary rest in the waters of the lake and drink its filthy water, whereby they neither die nor live to their hearts content. ¹⁷ Having thus passed over and over into various births, and having been transformed again and again to be reborn on earth, they are rolling like waves of the sea to all eternity.

Chapter 31 — Reality is within God; There Is no Reality without

It was for your enlightenment, O high minded Rama, that I have told you the story of Dama, Byala, and Kata so that you may derive instruction thereby, and not let it go for nothing as a mere idle story.

² Slighting the truth and following untruth incur endless miseries of which the careless pursuer of untruth is scarcely aware. ³ See how great was the leadership of Sambara's army and how they defeated the hosts of the immortal gods. Reflect on the change of their state to contemptible fish in a dry and dirty quagmire. ⁴ See their former strength which put legions of immortals to flight, and think on their later base servitude as hunters under the chief of Kiratis. ⁵ See at first their unselfishness of mind and great patience, then at last their vain desires and assumption of the vanity of egotism.

¹¹ Rama said, "Tell me sage, how did they come to existence when they were non-existent before? For neither can a nothing be an existent being nor an entity become a non-entity at anytime."

¹² Vasishta replied:—

So it is, O strong armed Rama, that nothing can ever be something and anything can never be nothing. But it is possible for a little thing to be great, and for a great one to be reduced to minuteness. ¹³ Tell me, what non-entity has come to being or what entity has been lasting forever? All these I will explain to you by the best proofs and examples.

¹⁴ Rama answered, "Why sage, all that is existent is ever present before us as our own bodies, and all things beside ourselves. But you said Dama and the other demons were unreal, produced by the magic of Sambara. How could they become real?"

Vasishta speaking:—

¹⁵ Yes Rama, the non-existent and unreal Dama and others seemed to exist by mere illusion, like a mirage appears to be full of water by optical illusion. ¹⁶ It is in the same manner that we, these gods and demigods, and everything else are unrealities in fact, and yet we seem to turn about and speak and act like real persons.

¹⁷ My existence is as unreal as yours, yet it appears as real as our dream of death in sleep. ¹⁸ As the sight of a dead friend in a dream is not real, so the notion of the reality of the world ceases upon the conviction of its unreality, just as that of the death of the person seen in a dream. ¹⁹ But such assertions of our non-existence are unacceptable to those deluded into the belief of the reality of the objects of the senses. It is the habit of thinking its reality that will not listen to its contradiction.

²² The learned and the ignorant cannot agree on this subject, just as drunken and sober men cannot reach an understanding. One who has the distinct knowledge of light and darkness knows the difference between shade and sunlight. ²³ It is impossible to turn the ignorant from their belief in the reality of unrealities to truth, just as it is impossible to make a corpse stand on its legs and walk. ²⁴ It is in vain to preach the doctrine of that "Brahman is all" to the vulgar who do not know pure meditation and remain devoted to their ideas that things which can be sensed are real. ²⁵ The learned who know themselves to be Brahman know that it is useless to lecture the ignorant on this subject.

³¹ Therefore, though we and others, and that Dama and the other demons, are nothing in reality, yet who can believe that we or these or those are not ourselves? ³² There is but One Being that is really existent, who is truth and consciousness himself and of the nature of emptiness and pure understanding. He is immaculate, all pervading, quiescent and without rise or fall. ³³ Being perfect silence and void, he seems as nothing existent, yet all these creations exist in that emptiness as particles of his own splendor. ³⁴ As the stars are seen to shine resplendent in the darkness of night, and as worms and waves are seen to float on the surface of waters, so do all these phenomena appear to occur in his reality.

³⁵ Whatever that Being purposes himself to be, he immediately conceives himself to be the same. It is only that empty Consciousness which is the true reality. All others are also real when viewed in It and rising and setting in It out of Its own will. ³⁶ Therefore there is nothing real or unreal in the three worlds. It is all of or in the same form as it is viewed by Consciousness. It all arises before Consciousness of its own spontaneity.

³⁷ We also have sprung from that Divine Will, like Dama and others. Therefore there is no reality or unreality in any of us, except at the time when we exist or cease to do so. ³⁸ This infinite and formless void of Consciousness is omnipresent and all pervading. In whatever form this Consciousness manifests itself in any place, it appears there in the same figure and manner.

³⁹ As divine Consciousness expanded itself with the images of Dama and others, it immediately assumed those shapes by its notions of the same.⁴⁰ So it is with every one of us, that all things are produced to our view according to our notions presented to our consciousness.⁴¹ What we call the world is the representation of things to us as in our dream. It is a hollow body like a bubble rising in the empty ocean of Consciousness and appearing as the water in a mirage.

⁴² The waking state of the empty intellect is called the phenomenal world, and its state of sleep and rest is what we call liberation, emancipation or salvation from pain.⁴³ But Consciousness which never sleeps, nor has to be awakened at anytime, is the emptiness of the Divine Mind, in which the world is ever present in its visible form.⁴⁴ There the work of creation is united with the rest of nirvana, and the cessation of the act of creation is joined with uninterrupted quiet. Yet no difference whatever exists in God between alternating work and rest at anytime.⁴⁵ The Divine Intellect views its own form in the world, and it views the world in itself in its true sense; like a blinded eye sees the inner light in its orbit.⁴⁶ The Divine Intellect, like the blinded eye, sees nothing outside, but views every form within itself. This is because there is no visible or phenomenal world other than what is within the empty sphere of the Intellect.

⁴⁷ There are all these things everywhere, as we have ideas of them in our minds, but there is never anything anywhere if we have no previous idea of it in the mind. It is the one quiet spirit of God which lies extended in all these forms coming to our knowledge. Therefore knowing him as all in all, give up all your fears and sorrows and duality, rest in peace in his unity.

Chapter 32 — Dama, Byala & Kata Obtain Liberation; On Good Conduct

¹ Rama said, “Tell me sage, how did Dama, Byala and Kata finally obtain their liberation, like all other virtuous souls, and become released from the torments of hell, like children getting rid of the fear of yaksha demons and pisacha ghosts?”

² Vasishta replied:—

Hear, O support of Raghu’s race, what Yama said about Dama, Byala and their companions when they asked for their liberation through his attendants in hell. ³ Yama said that Dama and others would obtain their liberation upon death releasing them from their demonic bodies, and upon hearing the account of their lives and actions.

⁴ Rama said, “Tell me sage, how, when and from what source did Dama and others come to learn the accounts of their lives, and how they obtained their release from hell.”

⁵ Vasishta replied:—

These demons, transformed into fish in a pool by the bank of the great lotus lake in Kashmir, underwent many miserable births in their fish-like forms in that same pond. ⁶ In that marshy ground, they were crushed to death under the feet of buffaloes. Then they were transformed into the shapes of cranes frequenting that lake of lotuses. ⁷ They fed upon moss and mushrooms and tender petals of lotuses. They had to live upon the leaves of aquatic plants and vines that floated on the surface of the waves. ⁸ They swung in cradles of flowers, rested on beds of blue lotuses, dived in vortices of the waters, and flew under the cooling showers of rainy clouds. ⁹ At last, these charming cranes and herons were cleansed of their brutish foulness by their vegetable food of sweet fruits and flowers and by their pure beverage of the crystal lake, the food of holy saints.

¹⁶ At that time there was a king in that city named Yasaskara or the renowned who reigned there like Indra over the gods in heaven. ¹⁷ The demon Dama became a gnat and dwelt in that building and continued to buzz his low tune in the crevice of a lofty column.

¹⁸ It came to pass that the citizens of Adhishthana prepared a playground named Ratnavati-vehara in that city. ¹⁹ There resided the king’s minister, Narasimha by name. He understood the fates of human kind, just as the astronomer knows the stars of heaven on a small celestial globe which he holds in his hand. ²⁰ It also happened at that time that the deceitful demon Kata was as reborn as a parrot and became the minister's favorite, kept in a silver cage in his house.

²⁵ In this manner, O Rama, the sparrow on Pradyumna Hill, the gnat in the palace, and the parrot in the playground all had their liberation.

³⁹ Nobody should walk in paths that are long and wearisome, crooked and winding, and surrounded by dangers and difficulties. Rahu, the ascending node of the moon, lost its life by its curved course to drink the nectarine beams of the moon. ⁴⁰ He who abides by the dictates of the true scriptures and associates with the best of men is never subject to the darkness of error. ⁴¹ Those renowned for their virtues have the power to bring their destiny under their command, convert all their evils to good, and render their prosperity perpetual.

⁴⁵ Continue to abide by the established rule of conduct, act according to the scriptures and good customs, and break off the bonds of worldly enjoyments, which are all only vanities. ⁴⁶ Let the world resound with the renown of your virtues reaching to the skies, because your fame and not the enjoyments you have enjoyed will immortalize your name. ⁴⁷ Those whose good deeds shine like moonbeams and are sung by the maidens of heaven are said to be truly living. All others unknown to fame are really dead.

⁵⁰ Now Rama, renounce all your sorrow and fear, your anxieties, pride and hastiness. Conduct yourself according to the law and scriptures and immortalize your name. ⁵¹ Take care that your sensuous soul does not perish like prey in the snare of your sensual appetites, or like a blind old man falling into the hidden pits of this world. ⁵² Do not allow yourself to be degraded below the vulgar, but consider well the scriptures as the best weapons to defeat the dangers and difficulties of the world.

⁵⁸ Know difficulty to be your prosperity and your detachment from the world to be your great gain. Conduct yourself according to the meaning of the scriptures, as they are supported by good custom.

⁵⁹ Acts done according to the scriptures and good customs produce the best fruits, that of immortality.

⁶⁰ He who acts well according to good customs, who considers everything by good reason, and who is indifferent to the pains and pleasures of the world flourishes like an tree in spring with the flowers and fruits of long life and fame, virtues and good qualities and prosperity.

Chapter 33 — Effort Attains; Ego & Its Three Forms

Knowing that the complete success of every undertaking depends on your own effort at all times and places, you should never be slack in your efforts. ² See how Nandi gratified the wishes of all his friends and relations by his own exertions, and how he became victorious over death itself by his adoration of Mahadeva Shiva by the side of a lake. ³ See also, how the danava demigods by their greater wealth and prowess got the better of the gods who were filled with every perfection, just like elephants destroy a lake of lotuses. ⁴ See how Marutta, the king of demons, by means of his sacrifice through the great sage Samvarta (the law giver), created another world like that of Brahma.

⁵ See, how Vishwamitra the general obtained the dignity of being one with Brahman by his great energy and continued efforts. By his austerities, he obtained what is impossible for another. ⁶ See how in days of yore the poor and unfortunate Upamanyu obtained his nectar-like food of cake and curdled milk from the Milky Ocean by worshipping Shiva. ⁷ See how the god Vishnu devoured the demons of the triple world like a wildfire destroys the tender filaments of lotuses, and how the sage Sweta became victorious over death by means of his firm faith in Shiva. ⁸ Remember, how the chaste Savitri brought back her spouse Satyavana from the realm of death by prevailing on stern Yama with the sweet politeness of her discourse.

²⁰ Now that we have our passive consciousness of the three worlds, this being the sober truth of the wise, there can be no room for the unrealities of matter and illusion to enter into our belief. ²¹ The world is whatever wonders are displayed by the active consciousness to the inactive soul.²² The notion of the world is derived from the rays of the central intellect stretching to the circumference of understanding. There being no difference between the radiating point and the radiated circle, we acknowledge the identity of the radiator, the radius and the circle.

³⁹ It is because we have no knowledge of the one Ego that we think ourselves as “I”, “you”, “this” or the other. It is by shutting out our view of the only Soul that we see the constant revolutions of this world and that. ⁴⁰ As long as the darkness of egoism reigns over the wilderness of human life, the goblin of selfishness infest it with its wanton revelry. ⁴¹ The vile man seized by the avaricious demon of selfishness is at an utter loss to satisfy his needs with any moral precept or spiritual mantra.

⁴² Rama said, “Tell me, O venerable brahmin, how can we suppress our egoism or selfishness and evade the dangers and difficulties in our course through the world?”

⁴³ Vasishta replied:—

It is by seeking to settle the mind in the resplendent soul that shines in the transparent mirror of consciousness. In this way it is possible for anybody to suppress his sense of personal existence.

⁴⁸ Rama said, “Tell me, sage, what is the form of ego? Does it exist in the body or mind or both? Is it eliminated when the body dies?”

⁴⁹ Vasishta replied:—

Rama, in this triple world there are three sorts of egoism. Two are of superior nature, but the third is of a vile kind and is to be abandoned by all.

⁵⁰ The first is the supreme and undivided Ego that is diffused throughout the world. It is the Supreme Soul (paramatma) beside which there is nothing in nature. ⁵¹ The feeling of this kind of Egoism leads to the liberation of men, as in the state of the living-liberated.

The next form of self-consciousness is the knowledge of ego as distinct and apart from all, and as minute as the hundredth part of a hair. This ego is good also. ⁵² This second form of ego also leads to the liberation of human souls, even in the state known as living-liberation.

⁵³ The last and worst kind of ego is identification with the body and all its parts. This ego takes the body to be the soul or self. ⁵⁴ This third and last kind is the popular belief of mankind who take their bodies as parts of themselves. It is the basest form of ego and must be forsaken in the same manner as we shun our inveterate enemies. ⁵⁵ The man debased by this kind of ego can never come to his right sense. Under the thrall of this powerful enemy, a man remains subject to all the evils of life.

⁵⁶ Possessed with this wrong notion of himself, every man is constantly troubled by various desires in his mind, and these expose him to all the evils of life.

⁶⁰ It was owing to their baser sense of ego that the demons Dama, Byala and others were reduced to that deplorable state, as was related in their story.

⁶¹ Rama said, “Sage, describe to me the state of a man who has discarded the third or popular kind of ego from his mind, a man who attains the well being of his soul in both the present and future worlds.”

⁶² Vasishtha replied:—

Having cast off this poisonous ego, a man rests in the Supreme Spirit in the same manner as the believers in the two other sorts of ego.

⁷¹ The man who has nothing of his own, who knows himself as nothing, and yet who has all and thinks himself as all in all, and who though possessed of wealth and properties has the generosity of his soul to disown them to himself, he truly is situated in the Supreme Soul and finds his rest in the state of Supreme bliss.

Now, hear me describe what Samvara did after the flight of Dama and his army, and how he remained in his rocky stronghold in the region of hell.

² After the complete overthrow of Samvara's entire army and their downfall from heaven like innumerable raindrops falling from a great cloud, and after dispersing itself and disappearing in autumn, ³ Samvara remained motionless for many years in his strong citadel, numbed by the loss of his forces defeated by the gods. He wondered about the best means of overcoming the gods.

⁴ He thought, "The demons Dama and others that I produced by my black arts are all defeated in battle by their foolishness and vanity of pride and ego. ⁵ Now I will produce some other demons by the power of my charm, and endue them both with the power of reason and acquaintance with spiritual science so that they may know and judge for themselves. ⁶ These, being acquainted with the true nature of things and devoid of false views, will not be subject to pride or vanity, but will be able to defeat the gods in combat."

¹⁰ These infernal spirits burst out of the ether and sprang up to the upper world, then spread over the face of the sky like a swarm of locusts. They cracked like guns and roared and rolled about like the clouds of the rainy season. ¹¹ They fought with the gods for many cycles of years, yet they were not elated with pride owing to their being under the guidance of reason and judgment.

¹² No one could defeat them because they had no desire of having anything and no thought that "this is my own." They had no identity as a personal existence, such as, "This is me, and that one is another."

¹³ They were fearless fighting the gods because they knew that they were as mortal as themselves, and because they lacked any knowledge of any difference between one another. ¹⁴ They attacked with a firm conviction that the unsubstantial body is nothing, the intellect is lodged in the pure soul, and that there is nothing which we call "I" or "another." ¹⁵ These demons were devoid of the sense of themselves or their fears. They necessarily had no fear of death. They were employed in their present duties without thoughts of past or future. ¹⁶ Their minds were attached to nothing. They slew their enemies without thinking themselves as their slayers. They did their duties and thought themselves as no doers of them. They were utterly free from all desires. ¹⁷ They waged war under the sense of doing their duty to their master, while their own nature was entirely free from all passion and affection, always remaining at even tenor.

¹⁸ The infernal force under the command of Bhima, Bhasa and Dridha bruised and burned and slew and devoured the celestial phalanx, as men knead and fry and boil rice and afterward eat it up as their food. ¹⁹ The celestial army, harassed on all sides by Bhima, Bhasa and Dridha, fled precipitately from the height of heaven, as the Ganges runs down from the Himalayan heights.²⁰ The defeated legion of the gods then resorted to the god Vishnu, sleeping on the surface of the ocean of milk, just as the clouds of heaven are driven by winds to the tops of mountains.

²³ Then there was a dreadful war between Vishnu and Samvara which broke and bore away the mountains as in an untimely great deluge of the earth.²⁴ The mighty demon, finally overthrown by the might of Narayana, was sent to and settled in the city of Vishnu after his death.²⁵ The demons Bhima, Bhasa and Dridha were also killed in their unequal struggle with Vishnu and were extinguished like lamps by the wind.²⁶ They became extinct like flames of fire, and it was not known where their vital flame fled. It is the desire of a person that leads him to another state, but these having no wish in them had no other place to go.²⁷ Hence the soul without wish is liberated, but not the mind full of yearning desires.

Therefore, O Rama, use your reason to have a mind and soul without wishes.²⁸ A full investigation into truth will immediately put down your desires, and the extinction of desires will restore your mind to rest like an extinguished candle.²⁹ Complete wisdom consists in the knowledge of there being nothing real in this world, that our knowledge of reality is utterly false, and that nothingness is the true reality.

³⁰ The whole world is full with the spirit of God, whatever otherwise one may think of it at anytime. There can be no other thought of it except that it is a nothingness, and this forms our perfect knowledge of it.³¹ The two significant words “will” and “mind” are mere insignificant fictions, like the head and trunk of the ascending and descending nodes of a planet which, upon their right understanding, are lost in the Supreme Spirit.

³² The mind accompanied by its desires is confined in this world, but when the mind is released from desires it is said to have its liberation.³³ The mind gains its existence in the belief of men because of the many ideas of pots and pictures and other things that are imprinted in it. But when these thoughts are repressed, the mind also vanishes of itself, like the phantoms of yaksha demons.³⁴ The demons Dama, Byala and Kata were destroyed because they relied on their minds, but Bhima, Bhasa and Dridha were saved by their belief in the Supreme Soul as pervading all things. Therefore, O Rama, reject the examples of the former and imitate those of the latter.

³⁵ “Be not guided by the example of Dama, Byala and Kata,” is the lesson that was first delivered to me by Brahma the lotus-born and my progenitor himself.³⁶ This lesson I repeat to you, O Rama, as my intelligent pupil, that you may never follow the example of the wicked demons Dama and others, but imitate the conduct of the good spirits Bhima and others in your conduct.

³⁷ It is constant pain and pleasure that forms the fearful feature of this world. There is no other way of evading all its pangs and pains except by your apathetic behavior, which must be your crowning glory in this life.

Chapter 35 — Description of Detachment & Bliss

Blessed are the virtuous who have cleansed their hearts from the dirt of ignorance. Victorious are those heroes who have conquered their insatiable and uncontrollable minds. ² It is self-control, the management of one's own mind, that is the only means of wading through all troubles and distress amid all the dangers and difficulties of this world.

³ Hear the summary of all knowledge and retain and cultivate it constantly in your mind. The desire of enjoyment is our bondage in the world and its abandonment is our release from it. ⁴ What need is there of many teachings? Learn this one truth as the sum and substance of all. All pleasures are poisonous and destructive. You must fly from them as from venomous snakes and a raging fire.

¹⁸ The elevation of the mind in worldly affairs tends to its destruction, and its depression in these leads to its spiritual elevation. The wise always lower their minds (pride) but fools are for elevating them. ¹⁹ The mind makes the world its own and ranges all about it. The mind raises mountains and climbs over them. The mind is like an infinite vacuum. It comprehends all emptiness in itself and it makes gods of friends and foes of others.

²⁰ When understanding is soiled by doubts and forgets the true nature of consciousness, and when it is full of all its worldly desires, then it takes upon the name “mind.” ²¹ Consciousness perverted by its various desires is called the living soul or the animal soul, which is distinct from the rational soul.

²⁸ As the desire or thought is in the mind, so is it born in its next state of transmigration. Hence the new born babe is given to sleeping because it thinks itself to be still dead, lying in the nighttime of his death. It is also given to the dreaming of those things which had been the objects of its desire or thought in its previous state or birth.

³⁶ The world is a magical city, like a mirage appearing to sight. It is of the nature of a delusive panorama that shows many moons of the one whose unity admits of no duality. So the one Brahman is represented as many by delusion. ³⁷ All this truly is the essence of Brahman and this is the sober reality. The material world is insubstantial and when seen truly appears as a hollow phantom.

³⁸ The ignorant person’s misjudgment is that “I am not the infinite but an infinitesimal,” but the certainty of my infinity and supremacy is the means for my absorption into the Infinite and Supreme.

is the cause of bondage to his personality. It is a web spun by his false dualism. ⁴⁰ The supreme truths of true philosophy are the lack of knowledge of one's bondage or freedom, the knowledge of his unity or duality, and his belief in the totality of Brahman.

⁴³ O Rama, think that your soul is same with the souls of all other persons and abstain from all other thoughts, whether what is desirable or undesirable, what invigorates or enfeebles the body, or what brings liberation after bondage, or salvation after sinfulness. ⁴⁴ The mirror of the mind, cleansed by the knowledge of the scriptures and made dispassionate through understanding, receives the reflection of Brahman like a clear crystal reflecting the images of things.

⁴⁷ Visible sights which are obvious to view are all only unreal phantoms. It is the absorption of the mind in the Divine that makes it identical with the Divine and no other. ⁴⁸ We see something with our attention now, but it was not in our sight before or after we turn away. Therefore it must be considered absent in between before and after. Therefore one unacquainted with his mind is as ignorant as the man who is unaware of what he holds in his own hand.

⁴⁹ One having no knowledge that the world is the same with the Supreme Spirit is always subject to misery, but the negation of any distinction between what can be perceived and God gives us both the pleasure of our enjoyments here and our liberation in future. ⁵⁰ It is ignorance to say that water is one thing and its wave is another, but it shows intelligence to say they are the one and the same thing.

⁶⁰ Then the streams of our desires do not run down the rock of the body, nor do the peacocks of our fleeting wishes fly and sport on its top. ⁶¹ The sphere of our consciousness becomes as the clear sky and the light of the living soul shines as brightly over the body like the midday sun. ⁶² The cloud of error is dispelled and succeeded by the light of reason. The longings of the soul, purified of their impurities, make it shine brilliantly amidst its sphere.

⁶⁸ The man whose investigation has made him acquainted with all things, whose soul is enlightened with truth, whose mind is melted down from his pride, who is calm and quiet in his understanding, and who looks with pity at the unpleasant course of men's births and deaths, he truly lives happily in the realm of his body without feverish anxiety about anything.

Chapter 36 — Description of the Intellect's Creation

¹ Rama said, “Tell me O brahmin, for the sake of my advancement in knowledge, how does the mundane system exist in the extra mundane immaterial soul?”

² Vasishta replied:—

Worlds have no separate existence except in the Supreme Mind. They are all situated in Divine Consciousness like future waves exist in a calm sea.

³ As the all-pervading sky cannot be seen owing to its extreme lack of substance, so the undivided nature of the all-pervasive Consciousness cannot be perceived on account of its subtlety. ⁴ As a gem has its own brilliancy whether or not someone moves it, so the unreal world has its potential existence in the Divine Spirit, both in its states of action and inactivity.

¹⁶ As a heap of fire emits its flame, a luminous body blazes with its rays, and as the sea swells in surges and breaks in with its inlets, so consciousness bursts out in its creations. ¹⁷ Thus consciousness which is self-manifest and omnipresent of its own nature, develops and envelops the world by its own manifestation and sight, and by its acts of integration and segregation, and its acts of accretion and secretion. ¹⁸ By its own error and of its own accord, it is led to forget and forsake its state of infinity. By assuming its individual personality of ego, it is converted to an ignoramus. ¹⁹ By its act of specialization, it falls from its knowledge of generals to that of particulars and comes to make differences between positive and negative, and inclusion and exclusion. ²⁰ It strives and struggles within the confines of the sensuous body and it multiplies in these bodies like weeds sprouting out of the bosom of the earth.

²¹ It is consciousness that stretches the spacious vacuum to make room for the subsistence and growth of everything. Consciousness makes the all and ever moving air and the liquid water for the vitality and nourishment of all. ²² It makes the earth firm and the fire bright and the fixed worlds all around. It employs time by its injunctions and prohibitions. ²³ It gives fragrance to flowers, growing by degrees their filaments and pistils. It makes the moisture in porous ground to grow vegetables on earth. ²⁴ The rooted trees bear fruit from their juicy saps beneath, displaying their leaves with outlines in them like their veins and arteries. ²⁵ It renovates the forest with its gifts of various colors, and dies them with the variety of colors from the rainbow of Indra.

Chapter 37 — Upasama: Stillness of the Soul; Apparent Activity of the Mind

In this manner, these series of worlds are revolving in their unchanging course, repeatedly appearing and disappearing in the substantiality of Brahman. ² All this is derived from the one self-existence. All this has become the reciprocal causes of one another by their mutual transformations, and again they are destroyed of themselves by their mutual destructiveness of one another.

⁷ Rama, that soul of yours whereby you perceive form and figures and sound and smell is the Supreme Brahman pervading all things. ⁸ The pure soul, being one in many and inherent in all external objects, cannot be thought of as being different from those that appear other than itself. ⁹ Rama, it is the difference of human thoughts that judges differently of the existence and non-existence of things, and of their good and bad natures also. It judges the world to exist either within or outside the Divine Spirit. ¹⁰ Because it is impossible for anything to exist outside the Spirit of God, it was the Spirit that willed to become many. As there was nothing beside itself which it could think of or find for itself, it was necessarily that it became so of itself without the aid of any extraneous matter. ¹¹ Therefore the will to do this or that or try for one thing or other does not relate to the soul but to the mind.

Thus the soul without choice, having no will of its own, does nothing except think on what is in itself. It is not an active agent owing to the union of all agency, instrumentality and objectivity in itself. It abides nowhere, being both the recipient and content, the container and the contained of everything in itself. Neither is the will-less soul action-less when the acts of creation are perceptible in itself. Nor is it possible that there is any other cause of them.

¹² Rama, you must know the nature of Brahman to be no other than this. Knowing him as no agent and without a second, be free from all anxiety.

¹³ I will tell you more. Though you may continue to do a great many acts here, yet tell me in a word, what do you do that is worth doing? Rely on the lack of your own agency and be quiet as the wise sage. Remain as calm and still as the clear ocean when unshaken by breeze. ¹⁴ Know well that it is not possible for the swiftest runners to reach their goal of perfection no matter how far they may run. You must desist in your mind from pursuing worldly objects and persist to meditate on the spirituality of your inner intellectual soul.

Chapter 38 — The Same Stillness of Spirit; the Mind as the Agent

Such being the state of the wise, the actions they are seen to do, whether of goodness or otherwise or pleasurable or painful, and regardless of what they are engaged in, are false and as nothing and do not affect them as they do other worldly mortals. ² For what is a person's action other than the exertion of mental and voluntary energies, with a fixed determination and desire of performing some physical acts?

⁶ He who has the knowledge of truth becomes relaxed in his earthly desires. Though he acts his part well, he does not long eagerly for its result like others do. He acts with his body but with a quiet unconcerned mind. When successful, he attributes the gain to the will of God, but the worldly minded arrogate the result to themselves, though they could not bring it about.

⁷ Whatever the mind intends truly comes to pass, and nothing is achieved without the application of the mind. Therefore, agency belongs to the mind and not to the body. ⁸ The world proceeds from the Divine Mind. The world is a development of the mind and it is situated in the (infinite and eternal) mind. Knowing all things to be manifestations of the powers of consciousness, the wise man remains cool to his desires.

⁹ The minds of those who know the soul come to the state of perfect detachment from their desires, just as when a false mirage of water is set down by raining clouds, and particles of morning dews are dried up by the raging sun. It is then that the soul is said to rest in its perfect bliss (turiya). ¹⁰ This is not the joy of the gusto of pleasure or the pain of sorrow or discontent. It does not consist of the liveliness of living beings or the inertness of stones. It is not situated in the midst of these opposites but in the knowing mind which is all rapture and ecstasy, infinite bliss (bhumananda).

¹³ Hence whether a man is the doer of an action or not, he perceives nothing of it when his mind is engrossed in some other thought or action. But he sees everything within himself who beholds everything in the abstract meditation of his mind. The thinking mind sees outward objects as reflections that are cast out from his pure consciousness.

¹⁵ He who knows the self remains joyous even in his calamity and shines like the moonlight which enlightens the world. He knows that it is his mind and not his self that is the agent of his actions, although he is the doer of them. Knowing that the mind is the agent in all his actions, he does not assume to himself the merit of the exercise of his limbs, hands and feet, nor does he expect to reap the rewards of all his constant labors and acts.

¹⁷ See how a boy is led by the fancy of his mind to build his toy or hobby-horse, which he dresses and paints in his willful play without showing any concern or feeling of pleasure or pain in its making or its breaking, however he pleases. So does man build his aerial castle and level it without any sense of gain or loss. It is by his acting in this manner in all worldly matters that no man is spiritually entangled to them.

¹⁸ Amidst the dangers and delights of this world, what cause can there be for your sorrow other than you have the one and not the other? But what is there so delectable and delightful to be desired in this world that at the same time is not impermanent and perishable? Only your self, your soul which is neither the active nor the passive agent of your actions and enjoyments, although people attribute actions and their fruitions to it by their error.

²¹ Though the sage is established in the light of his self-consciousness, yet he is aware of the distinctions between unity and duality, the true entity from the non-entities, and he sees the

omnipotence in all powers that are displayed in nature.²² To him there is no bond or freedom, no liberation or bondage whatever, and the miseries of ignorance are all lost in the light of his enlightenment.

²³ It is in vain to wish for liberation when the mind is tied down to the earth. So it is redundant to talk of bondage when the mind is already fastened to it. Shun them both by ignoring your individual ego and remain fixed to the true Ego. Continue in this way to manage yourself with an unruffled mind on this earth.

Chapter 39 — Vasishtha Postpones the Question of Impurity from Purity; the Unity of All Things

¹ Rama replied, “Tell me, O high-minded sage, how could creation proceed from the Supreme Brahma, whom you describe as remaining as still as a painting in the canvas of emptiness?”

² Vasishtha replied:—

O prince, such is the nature of Brahman that all power constantly flows from him, therefore every power is said to reside in him. ³ In him resides entity and non-entity. In him there is unity, duality and plurality, and the beginning and end of all things. ⁴ This is one and nothing else. It is like the sea whose waters have endless varieties of shapes. It represents the images of myriads of stars in its bosom, rising spontaneously of themselves.

⁵ As Consciousness becomes dense, it makes the mind and the mind brings forth all the powers of thinking, willing and acting. These it produces, accumulates, contains, shows and then absorbs in itself.

⁸ Rama interrupted and said, “Sage, your discourse is very dark, and I cannot understand the meaning of what you are saying. ⁹ There is the nature of Brahman, which you said to be beyond the perception of the mind and senses. Then what are these perishable things which you say have proceeded from him? If your reasoning comes to this conclusion, then I cannot rely upon it.”

¹⁰ “It is the law of production that anything produced from something is invariably of the same nature with that of its producer. ¹¹ As light is produced from light, grain comes from grain, and man is born of man, and all kinds come out of their own kind. ¹² Therefore the productions of the immutable Spirit must also be unchangeable and spiritual in their nature.”

¹³ “Beside all this, the Intellectual Spirit of God is pure and immaculate. This creation is all impure and gross matter.”

¹⁴ Upon hearing these words, the great sage said:—

Brahman is all purity and there is no impurity in him. The waves moving on the surface of the sea may be foul, but they do not soil the waters of the deep. ¹⁵ Rama, you cannot conceive of there being a second person or thing beside the one Brahman, just as you can have no conception of fire beside its heat.”

¹⁶ Rama replied, “Sage, Brahman is devoid of sorrow, while the world is full of sorrows. Therefore I cannot clearly understand your words when you say this to be the offspring of that.”

¹⁷ Valmiki said to Bharadwaja:—

At these words of Rama, the great sage Vasishtha remained silent. He stopped his lecture and contemplated. ¹⁸ His mind lost its accustomed clarity, then recovering its clear vision, he pondered within himself in the following manner.

¹⁹ The educated and intelligent mind that has known the knowable One has reached the end of the subject of liberation by its own reasoning and intuition, as that of Rama. ²⁰ It is no fault of the educated to have questions until it is explained to them to their full satisfaction, as in the case of Rama.

²¹ The half-educated are not fit to receive spiritual instruction because their view of phenomena, which dwells on obvious objects, proves to be the cause of their ruin. ²² But he who has come to understand in a transcendental light, and who has a clear insight of spiritual truths, feels no desire for sensual enjoyments and instead advances in course of time to the conclusion that Brahman is all in all things. (If the mind is pure, it instantly comprehends the truth.)

²⁷ The venerable Vasishta, who was the chief of sages and like the bright sun on earth, having considered these things, spoke to Rama as follows.

²⁸ Vasishta said:—

I will tell you Rama, at the conclusion of this lecture, whether the attribution of the impurity of gross bodies is applicable to Brahman or not.

³⁵ Whatever takes place at anytime or in any place and in any form is only a variety of the One Self-existent reality. Therefore why, O Rama, should you give vent to your sorrow or joy, or wonder at any change of time or place or nature and form of things? They are all full of the spirit of God and exhibit the endless aspects of the Infinite Mood.

³⁶ Let the intelligent preserve the sameness of their minds and dispositions amidst all changes, knowing them to be the varying conditions of the same unvarying Mind. ³⁷ He who sees his God in all and is filled with equanimity has no cause for surprise, grief or delight or any other fluctuation of his mind in response to any change in nature or the ups and downs of his fortune. ³⁸ In all the variations of time and place, and in all external circumstances, the unaltered mind continues to see the varieties of the power of his Maker.

⁴¹ There is no agent or object, no actor or act, or anything which is acted upon, nor is there anything that becomes nothing except by the variety of the one unity. ⁴² The mind that witnesses spiritual truths and retains its calmness unimpaired and unaffected by external accidents comes to see the light of truth by itself. ⁴³ If there is a lamp, there is light also. The sun shining brings the day with him. Where there is a flower, there is its fragrance. So where there is a living soul, there is the knowledge of the world.

⁴⁵ The immaculate Soul is the prime power of the appearance and disappearance of the myriads of gross bodies which, like the revolving stars of the sky and the seasonal flowers of spring, appear and reappear to us by turns, like the ups and downs of wheels in motion. ⁴⁶ All things die away when our souls are without us, but how can anything be nothing when we are in possession of our souls?

⁴⁷ All things appear before us in the presence of our souls and they vanish from before us in their absence from the body. ⁴⁸ Everything is born with us with our souls and is lost with loss of them. The living have all, but the dead are lost to view. (The human soul, when joined with the Divine, has a clear view of everything.)

⁵¹ The minds of men are endowed with their knowledge at their very birth. Then growing bigger by degrees in course of time, they expand themselves into the form of this spacious forest of the world.

⁵² The woods of the world are the fastening post of the soul where our blooming desires are filled with fruits of poignant grief. It branches out with gratifications, blossoms with old age, and is breaking its good post and wandering at large of its free will. Therefore Rama, cut off the tree of worldly existence (samsara) with the sword of discrimination.

Chapter 40 — Identity of the World with Brahman; Using Words

² Vasishta replied:—

I will tell you in brief the manner in which different species of beings are produced from Brahman, and how they are destroyed afterwards, and also how they obtain their liberation in the end, ³ also the manner of their growth and sustenance and fitness in the world.

¹⁶ Rama asked, “Sage, how can there be a part of the infinite Spirit, or a momentum of the motionless God, or a change or effort from one who is altogether without them?”

¹⁷ Vasishta replied:—

It is the usual and current mode of expression, both in scriptures and language, for people to talk in terms of, “All this is made by or come from Him.” But it is not so in its real and spiritual sense.

¹⁸ No change or partition, and no relation of space or time, bears any reference to the Supreme, who is unchangeable, infinite and eternal. There is no appearance or disappearance of Him at anytime or place, who is ever invisible everywhere. ¹⁹ There never was nor can there ever be any way of representing the incomprehensible, except by symbolical expressions. Therefore, I have made use of words that are used in common speech.

²⁰ Whatever words or expressions are used as symbolic of some sense, whether they express “produced from it” (tajja) or “change of the same” (tanmaya), the same should be used in that sense all along. ²¹ It is tajja when we say “fire proceeds from fire” (meaning, the “mundane Brahma comes out of the spiritual Brahma.” Here fire is symbolical of Brahma and the world). It is tanmaya in the expression “Brahma is the producer and produced” (meaning the identity and transformation of the Creator to the creation). ²² The first expression is applied to the world as proceeding from Brahma, but the other expression, that of the producer and produced, also means the creative power which made the world.

²⁴ The mind, by reason of its birth (tajja) from Brahma, possesses both the power and intelligence of his Consciousness, and is enabled to accomplish its intended purpose by means of its intense application. ²⁵ To say that one flame of fire produces the other is mere word dispute. There is no truth in this assertion. ²⁶ That one produces the other is also false reasoning because the one Brahma, being infinite, could produce no other thing beside reproducing himself.

³¹ This is one thing and that is another, and this is a part of the great soul, are all contradictory assertions of ignorance. No words can express the true nature of the unknown.

³⁴ Brahman being all of himself and all pervading and infinite of his own nature, there can be no other thing beside himself and anything that is produced of him is likewise himself. ³⁵ Beside the truth of the existence of Brahman, there is nothing which can be proved as absolutely certain. It is a scriptural truth that says, “Truly, all this is Brahman.”

³⁶ This also must be the conclusion, which you will arrive at by your reasoning, and which I will propose with many examples and teachings in the Book of Nirvana (Liberation).

³⁷ This single question raises many things of which you are ignorant. You will come to know fully in the future, and your questions on this subject will be dispelled. ³⁸ Unreality having disappeared, reality appears to view, just as the darkness of night being dispelled, the visible world comes to sight.

³⁹ The spacious world which appears to your false sight will vanish, O Rama, on your attainment of the state of calm stillness. False appearances must disappear from your vision as soon as the light of truth comes to dawn upon your soul.

Chapter 41 — Use of Words; Description of Ignorance

¹ Rama said, “Sage, I feel your speech to be as cooling and shining as the water of the milky sea. It is as deep and full as the vast ocean. ² Sometimes I am puzzled, other times I am enlightened by the variety of your discourses, as a rainy day is now hidden by a cloud, and again shines forth brightly with sunshine. ³ I understand Brahman as infinite and inconceivable and the life and light of all that exists. I know that light never sets. But tell me, how do people attribute many qualities that are foreign to his nature?”

⁴ Vasishta replied:—

The wording and meaning of my lectures to you are all used in their right and ordinary sense. They are neither insignificant nor meaningless, equivocal or ambiguous, or contradictory of one another. ⁵ You will understand the proper significance of my phraseology when the eyesight of your understanding becomes clearer and when the light of reason rises in your mind. ⁶ Do not make the mistake of relying upon your ordinary understanding to interpret the meanings of my words or the phraseology I have used to explain the subject of my lectures and the intention of the scriptures. ⁷ When you come to know the clear truth of Brahman, you will know more regarding the distinctions of significant words.

¹⁰ There is no attribute or imputation that bears any relation with the free and unsullied soul. It is the dispassionate spirit of the supreme Brahman, and the same is the soul of the existent world. ¹¹ This subject will again be fully discussed and expanded upon with various arguments when we arrive at the conclusion of this subject (in the Book of Nirvana).

¹⁶ Ignorance obscures the keenness of our insights and presents the false and gross world before us. We all view this wonderful universe, but we do not know what or how it is. ¹⁷ Unobserved, it rushes to our view, but being examined with attention and keen observation, it flies away. We know it is a phantasm, and yet find it appearing with dimensions and forms before us. ¹⁸ O the wonderful enchantment that has spread out this world and made unreality appear as a sober reality to the knowledge of every one of us.

¹⁹ This earth is a distinct, widely extended superstructure resting on the indistinct surface of an unknown foundation. He is the best of beings who has stretched this enchantment. ²⁰ When you are enlightened with the thought that all this is non-existent in reality, you will become the knower of the knowable (God) and understand the meaning of my lectures. ²¹ So long as you are not awakened to true knowledge, trust my words and know this immensity to be the creature of the incorrigible and immovable ignorance. ²² All this immensity that appears to sight is only the picture of your mistaken thought. It is all unsubstantial, only a mere manifestation of your deluded mind.

²³ He is entitled to liberation whose mind is certain of the reality of Brahman, and who knows the moving and unmoving figures outside to be the thoughts of the mind presented to the sight. ²⁴ The whole immensity of the earth is like a net set to catch the birds that are the fleeting mind. It is as false as a landscape in a dream, an unreality that appears as real to the mind.

²⁵ He who looks upon the world without attachment to it is never subject to grief or sorrow on any account. He who thinks all these forms are formless sees the formless spirit. ²⁶ The forms of the formless spirit are the formation of ignorance. When the blemishes of passions and change do not belong even to great souls, how can these attributes relate to the greatest God?

²⁹ As cloth cannot be thought of without its thread, so the soul is unintelligible without the medium of words giving its true definition. ³⁰ It is possible to gain knowledge of the soul from scriptures without one being self-conscious of it, just as it is possible to cross the sea of ignorance by means of spiritual knowledge.

Chapter 42 — From Brahman to Ordinary Mind: Producing Individual Souls

Rama, now hear what is the antidote against the widespread disease of ignorance and the raging epidemic of unreality, which vanish from view upon your close inspection of it. ² I am going to expand upon something I was going to mention earlier (in Chapter 40) concerning the qualities of sattva (purity) and rajas (activity) in order to investigate the powers of the mind.

³ The same Brahman who is all-pervading, undecaying and immortal, without beginning or end and free from error, is known as intellectual light. ⁴ The Intellect, which is the body of Brahma and has its vibration in itself, becomes agitated and condensed at intervals, like the translucent water of the ocean has its motion of itself and becomes dense and thickened by its disturbance. ⁵ As seawater is agitated in itself without any motion or excitation from without, so the almighty Power exerts its force in itself throughout all eternity and infinity.

⁶ As the air stirs in its own bosom of emptiness forever, so the power of the Divine Spirit exerts itself spontaneously and freely in its own sphere of the spirit. ⁷ As a flame rises high of its own accord, so the power of the Spirit extends in itself in all directions. ⁸ As the sea seems to move with its sparkling waters, reflecting the sun and moonbeams upon its surface, so the almighty Spirit appears to shake with the fleeting reflections of creation in its bosom. ⁹ As the sea sparkles with the golden beams of the starry sky, so the vast translucent soul of God shines with the light of its own intellectual sphere.

¹⁸ As there is no material difference of the armlet and bracelet from the same gold with which they are made, so Consciousness and the Soul are one and same thing. The thought makes the difference in their different modes. ¹⁹ As there is no difference between one lamp and the others that are lighted from the same light, so it is of all souls and intellects: they are alike in their nature, but differ only in their particular attributes.

²⁰ Consciousness, being put to action by the force of the soul on particular occasions, pursues its desires and the objects of its fancy. ²¹ The same consciousness also, taking its forms of will and action at different times and places, is called the embodied soul or spirit, and also known as kshetrajna, the knower of the field.²² The witness consciousness is so named from its familiarity with the body (kshetra) and its knowledge of its inner and outward actions.²³ This being filled with its desires, is designated as ego or selfishness, and this again being soiled by its fancies, takes the name of understanding.²⁴ Understanding leaning towards its wishes is called the mind, which when it is compacted for action, takes the name of the senses or sensation.²⁵ Next the senses are furnished with their organs called the organs of sense, which being joined with the organs of action, the hands and feet, are together called the body.²⁶ Thus the living soul being tied to its thoughts and desires, and being trapped in the net of pain and sorrow, is called the heart (chitta, the memory aspect of the mind).²⁷ Thus the gradual development of consciousness produces its successive results. These are the different states or conditions of the living soul, and not so many forms of it, but all these are the impurities of the soul.

³² The mind exposes the body to confinement by its pursuit of its desires, until it comes to feel the bitterness of its own bondage and the bitter regret of the conscious soul.³³ Knowing itself to be enslaved, it bids farewell to the freedom of its thought and knowledge and begets gross ignorance within itself, which rages and ranges free in the forest of this world with its horribly monstrous appearance.

³⁹ Know Rama that the heart-mind is tied to the earth by a chain of sorrow and misery. It is full to the brim with greed and grief and it is the abode of passions.⁴⁰ It is living dead with the cares of age and the fear of death to which the world is subject. It is troubled with desires and disgust and stained by its ignorance and passions.⁴¹ It is infested with the prickly thorns of its wishes and the brambles of its acts. It is quite forgetful of its origin and it is beset by the evils of its own making.⁴² It is confined like a silkworm in its own cocoon where it is doomed to dwell with its sorrow and pain. Although it is only a minute particle in its shape, it is the seat of endless hellfire. ⁴³ It is as minute as the soul, and yet appears as huge as the highest hill. This world is a forest of wild poisonous trees branching out with their fruits of decay and death. ⁴⁴ The snare of desire is stretched over the whole world. Its fruits are like those of Indian fig trees which have no core or flavor within.

⁴⁵ The mind being burnt by the flame of its sorrow and bitten by the serpent of its anger, and being drowned in the boisterous sea of its desires, has entirely forgotten its great Father (Brahma). ⁴⁶ It is like a lost male deer straying out of its herd, and like one deprived of reason by his sorrows, or more like a moth burned by the flame of world affairs. ⁴⁷ It is torn away like a limb from its place in the Spirit and thrown in an unsuitable spot. It is withering away like a lotus plant plucked from its root.

⁵⁰ The mind is carried away by the current of business like a man borne by the waves of the sea. Lift it, O brave Rama, from this pit, as they do an elephant sinking in the mud. ⁵¹ Lift up your mind by force, O Rama, like a bullock from this delusive puddle of the world where it is shorn of its brightness and is weakened in its frame.

⁵² Rama, the man whose mind is troubled in this world by successions of joy and grief, or by the vicissitudes of weakness from old age, disease and death, is no human being. He resembles a monstrous rakshasa demon, although he may have the figure of a man on him.

Chapter 43 — Varieties of Living Souls

Thus the living soul, being derived from Brahman, assumes to itself the form of the mind and is tossed about with the thoughts and cares of the world. Then it is changed into thousands and millions of forms that it creates to itself in its imagination.

² It has undergone many prior births and is in the course of migrating into many more. It will reincarnate into many more as multitudinous as the flitting particles of a waterfall. ³ These atomic souls of living beings, being subjected to their desires by the great variety of their wishes, are made to wander under many forms to which they are bound by their desires.

⁴ They wander constantly in different directions and in distant countries, both by land and water. They live or die in those places, like bubbles blow out only to float and burst and then sink in the water below. ⁵ Some are produced for the first time in a new kalpa age and others are born a hundred times in it. Some have had only two or three births while the births of others are beyond number. ⁶ Some are yet unborn and are to be born yet on earth and many others have passed their births by attainment of their liberation at last. Some are alive at present and others are no more to be born. ⁷ Some are born again and again for myriads of kalpas. Some remain in one state all along and many in various states repeatedly changing their forms and natures. ⁸ Some are subjected to the great misery of hell and some are destined to a little joy on earth. Some enjoy the great delights of the gods in heaven and others are raised to the glory of the heavenly bodies above.

⁹ Some are born as kinnaras (half-human, half-horse celestials) and gandharvas (male nature spirits), and others as vidyadharas (supernatural spirits) and huge serpents. Some appear in the forms of the Sun god, Indra and Varuna, and others in those of the three-eyed Shiva and the lotus-born Brahma. ¹⁰ Some become the kushmanda demons and vetala demon-ghosts, and others as yaksha (nature-spirit) and raksha demon cannibals. Some again become the brahmins and the ruling class, and others become vaisyas (merchant castes) and shudras (worker castes). ¹¹ Some become swapacha (low caste) and chandala (outcaste), and others as Kiratis and Pukkasa tribals.

Some become the grass and greens on earth, and others as the seeds of fruits and roots of vegetables, or as moths and butterflies in the air. ¹² Some are formed into varieties of herbs and creeping plants, and others into stones and rocks; some into jama and kadamba trees, and others into sala, palm and tamala forests.

²⁴ The living souls who are dominated by their desires are so powerless of themselves that they have forgotten their freedom and are fast chained to their wishes. ²⁵ They rove about the world, now flying up and then falling down in their hopes and fears. They are constantly tossed up and down, like play balls flung on all sides by the relentless hands of playful Death. ²⁶ Trapped in the hundred fold snare of desire and converted to the various forms of their wishes, they pass from one body to another, as birds fly from one tree to alight on another. ²⁷ The endless desires of the living soul, bred and led by the false imaginations of the mind, have spread this enchanted snare of illusion (maya) known by the name of the great world.

³⁰ However, there are some unconscious beings who, in spite of their attainment of this knowledge, after passing into a hundred lives in it in various shapes, are so perverted in their natures that they have to return again to this earth. ³¹ Some, after having attained higher states, fall down again by the lowness of their spirits and appear in the shapes of brute creatures, and at last have to fall into hell.

³² There are some great minded souls who, having proceeded from the state of Brahman, have to pass here a single life, after which they are absorbed in the Supreme Soul. ³³ There are multitudes of living beings in other worlds also, some of whom have become like the lotus-born Brahma and others as Shiva. ³⁴ There are others who have become like the gods or brute creatures in them, and there are snakes and other reptiles also in them, as well as in this earth.

³⁵ There are other worlds as obvious to view as this earth, and there are many such worlds that have gone by, and others are yet to appear. ³⁶ In the other worlds there are various other creatures of different shapes produced by various unknown causes and which have their growths and deaths like those of this earth. ³⁷ Some are produced as gandharvas and others as yakshas. Some are generated as sura demigods and some others as asura and daitya gods.

⁴¹ In this manner, multitudes of living beings with consciousness of their self-existence proceed from the Supreme Spirit, rising from and at last falling into it. ⁴² All created beings are detached from their source, like light from the lamp and solar rays from the sun. They are like sparks of red hot iron and the flashing sparks of fire. ⁴³ They are like the minute moments of time and the flying odors of flowers, or the cold icicles and particles of rainwater carried by breeze and cooling the air all around. ⁴⁴ The flitting particles of life, flying from one spot to another and filling different bodies with animation, are at last absorbed in the mainspring of vitality from where they had risen.

⁴⁵ Particles of vital air, being thus spread out and scattered over the universe, come to assume the various forms of animated beings in all the worlds. But they are all mere creations of our ignorance. In reality they are like the rolling waves of water in the vast ocean of eternity.

Chapter 44 — Description of Brahma's Self-Birth

² Vasishta replied:—

Why don't you know it, Rama, when I have explained it to you before? Where have you lost your deductive reasoning of arriving to the conclusion from those premises?

¹¹ We see the mighty lotus-born Brahma situated in the bud of that flower and find it to be the effect of the good thoughts he had in his mind. ¹² This unlimited creation is the false fabrication of imagination from which the living soul in conjunction with the mind obtains the state of Virinchi, Brahma the Creator.

¹³ Rama said, “Sage, I need to be fully informed whether all other beings sprang from the same cause as Brahma, the lotus-born.”

¹⁴ Vasishta answered:—

Let me tell you again, O long-armed Rama, how Brahma has a body. From his example, you will learn about the existence of the world.

¹⁸ First it thinks of the clear sky, the receptacle of sound, which is perceptible by the auditory organs. This thought being condensed in the mind makes it vibrate like the wind does the air. ¹⁹ Then it thinks about the vibrations of air, which are the objects of feeling, through the porous skin and the mind. It is moved by the thoughts of air and wind to assume that form which is invisible to the naked eye.²⁰ The condensation of the elements of air and wind together produce the idea of light which is the cause of sight and which has colors and forms for its objects. Thus the mind, moved by its triple thoughts of air, wind and light, produces the property of fire.²¹ These immediately join to produce the idea of coldness, the property of water. Then the mind forms the ideas of the four elements of air, wind, fire and water.²² These united together produce the gross form of earth, the receptacle of scent. Then the mind, filled with its thoughts of these minute elementary particles, forsook its fine form of the spirit for its gross body of the five elements (the fifth being ether, akasha).

²³ The mind saw this body shining like a spark of fire in the sky, which joined with its sense of self, ego, and understanding, formed its personality.²⁴ This is called the spiritual body within the eight-fold embodiment (earth, water, fire, air, space, mind, intellect and identity). The spiritual body is situated like a bee in the middle of the lotus-like heart and it gives growth to the outer body by its inner working.

²⁵ It is thickened by the action and internal heating process of the heart, like the bel fruit or woodapple. The outer body receives the qualities of the inner mind, just as a jewel shines with the luster of the little particle of gold, melted and infused within.²⁶ The quality of the inner soul or mind manifests itself in the outer body in the same way as the quality of a seed appears in the form and taste of its fruit.

Then the mind dwells upon the thoughts of its actions, which are expressed in the different organs and actions of the body, all produced by the motions of inner thoughts and acts, just like tree leaves and branches are projected by the inner process and operations of the seed.²⁷ Its thoughts of up and down lift and lower its head and feet upward and downward. Its thoughts of both sides extend its two arms to the right and left.²⁸ Its thoughts of backward and forward place its back behind and its breast and belly before. The hairs on the head and fingers of the hands are like the filaments and twigs of trees.

³³ Though situated in the Supreme, yet the mind of Brahma is liable to the mistakes of his own making, and at times it quite forgets having no beginning, middle or end, like his Source.

³⁶ Thus Brahma became the preserver of many kinds of beings which he created of his own will from his mind at each stage or kalpa-period. Of these beings, Brahma was the first that issued from Brahman himself.^{3 7} When Brahma was first begotten, he remained in his happy state of unconsciousness and forgetfulness, but being delivered from his mental inactivity in the womb, he came to see the light.³⁸ He took a physical body with its breathings and respirations. It was covered with pores of hair and furnished with gums and thirty-two teeth.³⁹ It had the three pots of shin bones, thighs, and backbone standing on feet below, with the five airs, five partitions, nine cavities, and a smooth skin covering all the limbs.⁴⁰ It is accompanied by twice ten fingers and their nails, and with a couple of arms and palms and two or more hands and eyes.

The lord Brahma looked upon his handsome body and saw that it was good.⁴³ Then the lord thought in himself, from his view of the three times of the past, present and future, and from his sight of the vault of heaven with a dark mist like a swarm of flying locusts,⁴⁴ “What is this boundless space? What had it been before? How did I come into being?” Thus pondering in himself, he was enlightened in his soul.

⁴⁵ He saw in his mind the different past creations and recollected the various religions and their various sects which had grown upon earth one after the other.⁴⁶ He produced the holy Vedas as spring does its flowers. He formed with ease all varieties of creatures from their archetypes in his mind.⁴⁷ He set them in their various laws and customs for their temporal and spiritual welfare, as he saw them in the city of his mind.⁴⁸ From their prototypes in his eternal mind, Brahma thought upon the innumerable varieties of scriptures which had existed before and all of which came to exist on earth in their visible forms, like flowers springing from the womb of spring season.

Chapter 45 — Dependence of All on God; Nothing Is Lost Which Doesn't Exist

The world appears as substantial but has nothing substantive in it. It is all a emptiness, a mere representation of images and aimless digressions of the mind. ² Neither time nor space is filled by any world at all, but by the great Spirit who has no form except that of vacuum.

⁷ The mind has made the body for its own home, as some silkworms build their cocoons. The soul also has its sheaths. ⁸ There is nothing which the mind can not get or build in its empty imagination, however difficult or unattainable it may appear to be. ⁹ What impossibility is there when the mind in its secluded cell possesses the same powers that reside in omnipotence?

¹⁰ It is not impossible, O Rama, for anything to be or not to be at anytime or always, when there is the omnipotent Lord who can create or annihilate all things at his will. ¹¹ Remember that if the mind is empowered to make its own body and to form others in its imagination, how much more is the power of the Almighty to make and unmake all things at his will. ¹² It is Divine Will that has brought the gods, demigods and all mankind into existence. It is by the cessation of the Will that they cease to exist as a lamp is extinguished for lack of oil.

¹³ See the sky and all things under it to be displayed by Divine Will and understand the universe as the visionary scene of your dream laid open to your sight. ¹⁴ There is nothing that is born or dies here at anytime, because everything is a nothing in its true sense. ¹⁵ There is nothing that becomes more or less in any way when there is nothing in existence. How can soul have a body when it is bodiless? How can the soul be divided when it is an undivided whole?

¹⁶ Rama, by your keen sightedness you see that all these bodies are bodiless. As the mirage is made to appear by the heat of the sun, ¹⁷ so do these false appearances seem as true to you from the certainty of your individual mind. So also Brahma and others are only creatures of your fancy. ¹⁸ They are as false as the sight of two moons in the sky by your false imagination. It is the great fallacy of your mind that represents these false forms of the world before you.

²² That this is a mountain and that is a tree are appendages affixed by our error and mistake. It is the prejudgment of the mind that makes unreality appear as a reality. ²³ The world is the creation of error and the idol of fools. Shun your fond desire and thoughts of it, Rama, and think of your unworldly soul. ²⁴ The world is as false as the visionary scene of a prolonged dream, or a building in the sky of the fancies of the mind. ²⁵ Shun this grand display of the world which is so substantial to sight and so insubstantial when felt. It is the den of the serpents of desire foaming with the poison of their passions. ²⁶ Knowing the world as unreal, try to regard it as nothing, because the wise will never go after a mirage knowing it as such.

³⁴ Know Rama, that nothing that exists is lost upon the dissolution of the world, and nothing which is non-existent of its nature can ever come into existence. ³⁵ Tell me Rama, what things are entire or broken, or are growing or decaying, when these ideas are only the formations of your sound or unsound mind or the working of your fancy? ³⁶ Children make and break their toy dolls of clay at will. In the same way the mind raises and erases its thoughts of all things in the world.

³⁷ As nothing is lost or drowned in the magical trick of a conjuror, so nothing is dead or dissolved in the magical sea of this world. ³⁸ The unrealities being all untrue, it is true that nothing is lost by their loss. Hence there is no cause for our joy or sorrow in this unreal world. ³⁹ If the world is altogether an unreality, I do not know what there is that could be lost in it. And if nothing whatever is really lost in it, what reason can there be for the wise to sorrow for it? ⁴⁰ If God is the only absolute existence, what else is there for us to lose? The whole universe being full with Brahman, there can be no cause for our joy or sorrow for anything whatever. ⁴¹ If the unreality can never come into existence, it cannot have its growth. What cause is there of our sorrow for their lack of growth or existence?

⁴² Thus everything is only unreal and merely a cause of our delusion. What can a wise man have to desire that may be reckoned as the best boon for us? ⁴³ But when all this is taken in the sense of being full with the Divine Spirit, what thing is there so trifling for a wise man to dispose or refuse to take?

⁴⁴ But he who considers the world as an unreality is never subject to joy or sorrow at his gain or loss of anything. Only the ignorant are elated or depressed at the one or the other. ⁴⁵ That which was not before nor will remain afterwards is likewise the same nothingness at present. Therefore who desires the non-existent is said in the scriptures to be nothing himself.

⁴⁶ What was before and what will be in the end, the same is in being even now. Therefore, what is always in being is that entity alone that is seen everywhere and at all times.

⁴⁷ There are the unreal sky and moon and stars seen underneath the water. It is only a deluded child who likes to look at them, but never the wise. ⁴⁸ Children take a liking for light, empty and flashy trinkets which are of no good or use to them or anybody else. Children prefer to be sad at their loss rather than derive any good from their gain whatever. ⁴⁹ Therefore, O lotus-eyed Rama, do act like a child but conduct yourself like the wise by looking at these fleeting trinkets as ever impermanent. Rely on the Everlasting alone.

⁵⁰ Rama, do be not sad or sorry to learn that all these, together with yourself and myself, are nothing in reality. Do not be glad or joyful to know that all these and ourselves are real entities. But consider alike whether these be or not be. Because it is the one Being that becomes and un-becomes anything. It is the only Being that becomes all things.

⁵¹ Valmiki said:—

As the sage was explaining in this manner, the day glided away to its dusk. The sun departed to his even tide and evening service, and with him the assembly parted to their evening ablutions and rest. After, with the rising sun, they assembled again in the court.

Chapter 46 — Description of Living-Liberation

No man knows sorrow as long as he is in possession of his pleasant home, family and wealth. But knowing them to be a short-lived enchantment and accompaniment, why should he be sorrowful when they disappear? ² What pleasure or pain can one derive either from the grandeur or destruction of his castle in the sky? What cause for joy can he have in his ignorant children, or of sorrow upon their death? ³ What joy is there in the increase of our wealth or family, seeing them as the increasing mirage of water which can never satisfy the thirsty. ⁴ There is increase of care with the increase of wealth and family. There is no happiness in the increase of worldly possessions and affections.

¹² He who knows the unrealities and who places no reliance in anything is said to have mastered all knowledge and is never liable to error. ¹³ He who knows himself to be as frail as anything in this frail world, who has his faith in neither, is never liable to fall into the error of taking either of them for real. ¹⁴ Placed between the unreality and reality of this and the next life, you must have the good sense to stick to the Truth and neither wholly reject nor stick to this or the next. ¹⁵ Though engaged in business, yet O Rama, you must remain quite indifferent to all things because the indifferent without desires are truly happy in this world.

¹⁹ Rama, when you come to feel that the objects of the senses have ceased to give any relish to your soul, then you shall know that you have reached the acme of your spiritual knowledge and passed over the boisterous sea of the world. ²⁰ The embodied or disembodied soul, whether living or dead, that has ceased to have any taste for sensuous enjoyments has attained its liberation without its wishing for it.

²¹ Rama, try by your superior intelligence to separate your mind from its desires, just like they extract perfume from flowers. ²² They who have not been swept away by the waves of their desires into the middle of this world ocean are said to have got over it; but others are no doubt drowned and lost in it.

³⁰ You too Rama have gained your extensive learning in philosophy. It is by virtue of your prudence that you can manage yourself with ease. ³¹ Suppress the sight of what can be seen and avoid your pride and enmity. Then roam wherever you will and you will meet with success. ³² Be sedate in all circumstances, unattached to the present and wishing to know all other things in future. Have the calm composure of your mind, and go where you will.

³³ Valmiki said:—

Being advised in this manner by the pure doctrines of the sage, Rama's face brightened. Full within himself with the ambrosia of his knowledge, he shone forth like the ambrosial moon with her cooling beams.

Chapter 47 — Description of Innumerable Different Worlds, their Gods & Time

¹ Rama said, “O venerable sage who is acquainted with all religious doctrines and is versed in all branches of the Vedas, I am set at perfect ease by your holy preaching. ² I never tire of hearing your speech, which is equally abundant, clear and elegant.”

³ “Sage, you have spoken of the birth of Brahma during your lecture on the productions of sattva and rajas qualities. I want you to tell me more about that subject.”

⁴ Vasishta answered:—

There have been many millions of Brahmas and many hundreds of Shivas and Indras together with thousands of Narayanas that have gone by. ⁵ There have also been various kinds of beings in many other worlds, having manners and customs widely differing from one another. ⁶ There also will be many other productions in the worlds, simultaneous with others, and many to be born at times remotely distant from one another. ⁷ Among these, the births of Brahma and the other gods in the different worlds are as wonderful as the productions of many things in a magic show.

⁸ Some creations were made with Brahma as the first born, others with Vishnu and some with Shiva as the next created beings. There were some other (minor productions) having the munis for the patriarchs.

⁹ One Brahma was lotus-born, another was produced from the water, a third was born of an egg, and the fourth was produced in the air. ¹⁰ In one egg the sun was born with all his eyes, and in another Indra as Vasava lord of the Vasus (his attendant gods). In some, one was born the lotus-eyed Vishnu, and in another he with his three eyes as Shiva.

²¹ There are many series of mundane worlds like the egg of Brahma which pass away in the thousands, like the hours in course of the year. ²² There are many such bodies beside the world system of Brahma (brahmanda) revolving at present in the spacious mind of Brahma. ²³ Many more physical worlds will grow in the infinity of the Divine Mind, and they will also vanish away in course of time, like the fleeting sounds in the air. ²⁴ Other worlds will come into existence in the course of other creations, just as pots come to be formed of clay and leaves grow from germs in endless succession. ²⁵ The glory of the three worlds appears to sight in consciousness just like it exists in the Divine Mind.

⁴³ Sometimes they imagine a being produced in the pure emptiness of the Divine Mind. This they call the golden and mundane egg which gave birth to the egg-born Brahma. ⁴⁴ It is also said that the first and Divine Male casts his seed in the waters which grows up into a lotus-flower which they call the great world. ⁴⁵ This lotus is the great womb of the birth of Brahma, and at another time of the sun also.

Sometimes the gods Varuna and Vayu are born of it, and therefore they are called egg-born.

⁴⁶ Thus Rama are the different accounts of the production of Brahma the Creator. Equally various are the descriptions of this un-solid and unsubstantial creation. ⁴⁷ I have already told you about the creation of one of these Brahmas, and mentioned the production of others without specifying their several works. ⁴⁸ It is agreed by all that creation is only the development of Divine Mind, although I have described various processes of its production for your acquaintance. ⁴⁹ The pure (satwiki) and other productions, of which I told you before, have all come to existence in the manner I have described for you.

⁵³ The four ages of the world, namely the Satya, Treta, Dwapara, and Kali Yugas (golden, silver, brass and iron ages) revolve in endless rotation, like the wheel of the potter or of any other engine.

⁵⁴ The manvantaras (ages of Manu, fourteen to a day of Brahma) and kalpa cycles succeed one another like day and night, morning and evening, and the times of work follow those of rest. ⁵⁵ All worlds and things are under the subjection of time. They are subject to repeated successions, and there is nothing without its rotation. ⁵⁶ They all proceed of their nature from the vacuum of Divine Consciousness, like sparks of fire flash from a red-hot iron.

⁶⁴ The unwise consider the world as eternal from the continued uniformity of its course. But the effect of the everlasting error raises the false supposition of the world. ⁶⁵ It is their theory of repeated reincarnations. They cannot say anything otherwise, but must conclude the world as such in order to keep pace with their doctrine. ⁶⁶ But it is to be wondered, if they see the constant perishable nature of all things all around, why do they not consider the world to be destructible? ⁶⁷ So others (the Samkhyas), seeing the continuous course of the sun and moon and the stability of mountains and seas all about, conclude from these false analogies that the world is indestructible.

⁶⁸ There can be nothing whatever which does not reside in the wide expanse of the Divine Mind. But as these are only the conceptions of the mind, they can never have any visible or separate form of existence. ⁶⁹ All these appear in repetition, and also repeated is the course of our births and deaths, as those of pain and pleasure follow one another, and our rest and actions following each other for evermore. ⁷⁰ This same vacuum and these quarters of the sky, with all these seas and mountains, appear in the recurrent course of creation with their various colors, like sunshine seen through the chink of a wall. ⁷¹ Gods and demigods appear again and again and all people come and depart by turns. Bondage and liberation are ever recurrent, and Indras and Somas ever reappear to view.

⁸⁸ Now Rama, consider whether there is any stability of anything in this revolutionary world, other than it being a maze of continuous delusion. ⁸⁹ The revolution of the world resembles the hallucination of Dasura's mind. It is a fantasy without any solidity in it. ⁹⁰ The world appearing so extensive and thickly peopled is only a fancied unreality, like the false appearance of two moons in the sky. Though appearing as real by our ignorance of its nature, it is made of unreality and is not worth reliance.

Chapter 48 — Story of Dasura; He Receives Agni's Boon to Live Treetop

All worldly men who are engaged in various activities and who are perverted in their understanding with desires of wealth and enjoyments, can never learn the truth until they get rid of their worldliness.

² Only he who has cultivated his understanding and subdued his sensual organs can perceive the errors of the world, as one knows a bel fruit held in his hand.

⁷ Rama said, “Tell me sage, the story of Dasura which illustrates the visionary and air-drawn form of this rotating universe, all hollow within.”

⁸ Vasishta replied:—

Hear me repeat for you, O Rama, the story of Dasura. It is an illustration of the delusive form of the world, which is no more than the built-in-the-air utopia of our brains.

¹⁷ Rama said, “I want to know, O sage, from where and how did that hermit come to dwell in that forest, and why was he sitting on that tall kadamba tree?”

¹⁸ Vasishta replied:—

His father was the renowned sage Sharaloma, who lived on the same mountain and resembled the great Brahma in his abstract meditation. ¹⁹ Like Kacha, the only child of Brihaspati, the preceptor of the gods, Dasura was the only son of Sahraloma. From his boyhood, he and his father came to dwell in the forest. ²⁰ Sharaloma lived many years in this way until he left his mortal frame for his heavenly abode, as a bird quits its nest to fly into the air.

⁴¹ Being so asked by the brahmin boy, the god pronounced, “Be it so,” from his flaming mouth, and vanished from sight. ⁴² As the god disappeared from before him, like daylight from the face of the lotus flower, the son of the sage was fully satisfied with his desired boon. His face shone like the full moon. ⁴³ Conscious of the success of his desire, his gladdened countenance brightened with his blooming smiles, just as the white lotus, as soon as it perceives the smiling moonbeams falling upon it, blushes with its smiling petals.

Chapter 49 — Description of Dasura's Kadamba Forest

Thus Dasura remained in the forest that reached to the region of the clouds and formed a stage for the halting of the tired horses of the meridian sun at midday. ² Its far stretching boughs spread a canopy on all sides under the roof of heaven, and it looked to the skies all around with its full blown blossoming eyes. ³ Gentle winds shed fragrant dust from the tufts of its hanging hairs, which, studded with swarms of fluttering bees and its leaves waving like palms of its hands, brushed over the face of its fairy sky.

¹³ The forest's thousands of uplifted branches seemed like the god Vishwarupa lifting his thousand arms on high, dancing with the breeze, the sun and moon hanging like earrings on either side.

³⁴ The kadamba tree was like the Nandana garden of paradise, having alcoves under its thickening branches and caves formed by the flowery vines below it, while the birds of heaven hovered about it like its perpetual inhabitants.

Chapter 50 — Dasura's Survey of the Heavens

Dasura remained in this flowery tree as if he lived on a hill of flowers. In his mind he felt the delight which flowery spring and its fruit could infuse in the heart. ² He mounted and sat over the high and airy treetop and looked on all sides like the god Vishnu surveying the worlds. ³ There, sitting on a branch that reached to the sky, he engaged in his tapas (penance), devoid of fear and desire.

The fair face of the sky appeared like the face of a fairy covered under the blue veil of a cloud. ⁶ The green leaves of trees were like the green garb of this fairy, and clusters of flowers were like garlands on her head. Distant lakes appearing like water-pots were decorated by their aquatic plants and flowers. ⁷ The fragrance of blooming lotuses seemed like the fairy's sweet breathing, and the gurgling of the waterfalls sounded like trinkets fastened to her feet. ⁸ The trees touching the skies were like the hairs on her body, the thick forests resembled her thighs, and the orbs of the sun and moon were like earrings hanging from her ears. ⁹ Fields of grain seemed like the dots of her sandal paste, and the rising hills were like her breasts covered by a cloudy cloak on their tops.

¹⁰ The seas with their shining waters were her mirrors that reflected the rays from the jewels on her starry frame. ¹¹ The season's fruits and flowers were like embroidery on her bodice, and the rays of the sun and moon were like powders or sandalwood paste over her body. ¹² Clouds covering the landscape were her garment, and trees and plants on the forest edges were as the fringes or the skirts of her dress.

In this manner he saw all ten sides of heaven full with the form of a fairy queen.

Dasura remained as an ascetic in his hermitage in that forest. He was known as Kadamba Dasura and he was a giant of austere penance. ² Sitting on the leaves of the vine growing on the branch of that tree, he looked up to heaven. Then sitting himself in the lotus posture, he called his mind back to himself.

Thus approached, the dame with deer-like eyes and protruding bosom replied to him. ¹² She said to the hermit with a sweet and charming voice, “May you prosper in obtaining the objects of your wishes. ¹³ Anything which is desirable and difficult to attain in this world is surely obtainable when sought after with proper effort by the great. ¹⁴ I am, O brahmin, a woodland goddess of this forest, which is so full of creeping plants and decorated by beautiful kadamba trees.”

²² So saying the sage dismissed the suppliant lady now gladdened in her face, and she promised to perform the necessary for her blessing’s sake. ²³ Then the lotus-eyed lady left and went to her home.

The hermit passed his months, seasons and years in his holy meditation.

²⁴ After a long time the lotus-eyed lady returned to the sage with her boy, now grown up to the twelfth year of his age. ²⁵ She made her obeisance and sat before him with her boy of the moon-bright face. She uttered her words, sweet as the murmur of a humble bee to a stately amra tree. ²⁶ “This, sage, is the would be son (Bhavya) of both of us, whom I have trained in all the branches of learning. ²⁷ He is only untaught in the best knowledge, that which releases the soul from its return to this world of troubles. ²⁸ My lord, please instruct him in that knowledge, for who is there that should like to keep his own son in ignorance?”

Chapter 52 — The Allegory of Air-Born King Khottha (Mind) and His Grand City

Once I passed by that way in my invisible body to bathe in the heavenly stream of Mandakini (Milky Way) in the ethereal regions. ² After my departure from that region by the way of the Seven Rishis (variously the Pleiades or the Big Dipper), I arrived at the place where Dasura lived on his high kadamba tree. ³ I heard a voice from the hollow of the tree in the forest, which was as charming as the buzzing of a bee fluttering about the bud of a lotus.

⁴ “Attend my intelligent son!” said Dasura, “to a story that I will tell you by way of a simile of worldly things. It is pleasant to hear.”

Dasura speaking:—

⁸ His unnumbered acts and exploits are filled with successive pains and pleasures. They are as interminable as the continuous waves of the sea. ⁹ No one has been able to check the prowess of that mighty brave king by force of fire or sword, as none has ever been able to press the wind in his hand. ¹⁰ Even the gods Indra, Vishnu and Shiva have fallen short of following his steps in his ambitious pursuits and in the splendid inventions of his imagination.

²⁰ The great king placed his yaksha of egoism as sentinel to guard this house. This guard is as ferocious as a fierce bhairava manifestation of Shiva in the dark (ignorance), and as timid as a bhairava by day. ²¹ The masters of these moving bodies play many pranks in them, like a bird plays and frolics in its own nest.

Chapter 53 — Explanation of the City

Then the boy asked his holy father, who was sitting reclined on his sacred kadamba tree in the midst of the forest of great Asia in the gloom of night. ² The son said, “Tell me sage, who is this air-born king of supernatural form who you described just now? I do not fully comprehend its meaning, and I want it to be explained to me clearly. ³ Sage, you said that this king constructs a new home for himself while residing in his present body, and leaves for it after he leaves the old frame. This seems impossible to me, as the joining of one tense with another, the present with the future.”

⁴ Dasura replied:—

My son, hear me tell you the meaning of this parable, which will explain to you the nature of this revolving world in its true light.

⁵ First I told you that in the beginning, a non-entity sprang from the entity of God, and this non-entity being stretched out afterwards gave rise to this illusory world called the cosmos. ⁶ The empty spirit of the Supreme Deity gives rise to his formless will, which therefore is called air-born (or mind-born). It is born of itself in its formless state from the formless Spirit, and dissolves itself into the same, just like a wave rising from and falling in the bosom of the sea. ⁷ Will produces everything, and there is nothing produced except by the Will. The Will is the same as its object, which constitutes and exists in it, and it lives and dies along with its object.

⁸ Know the gods Brahma, Vishnu, Indra, Shiva and the Rudras are offspring of the willful Mind, just like branches are the offshoots of the main tree and summits are projections of the principal mountain.

¹² Here pearly rivers flow in their winding courses and bear their swelling waves and rippling waves, shining like chains of pearls under sunbeams and moonlight. ¹³ The seven oceans appear like so many lakes of bright waters and, shining with their undersea fires, they resemble the lotus beds and mines of gems beneath the blue sky.

¹⁸ Some of these bodies have to act their parts for a long while, while others make their exits in a short time. Some are covered with caps of black hair, and others with white and grey on their heads.

¹⁹ All these bodies are furnished with nine crevices, consisting of the two ear holes, two sockets of the eyes, and two nostrils with the opening of the mouth, which are continually employed in inhaling and exhaling cold and hot air by their breathing.²⁰ The ear holes, nostrils and palate serve as windows to the abode of the body. The hands and feet are the gate ways, and the five inner organs are like the lights of these homes.

²⁵ The mind constructs a new house for its future home by virtue of its interminable desires in its present house, and which are expected to be realized and enjoyed in its future state. ²⁶ But no sooner does it cease to foster its desires than it ceases to exist and loses itself in that state of supreme bliss of which there can be no end. ²⁷ But it is born and reborn by its repeated desires, just as a child sees a ghost by its constant fear of it. ²⁸ Ego spreads the view of this miserable world before him. Absence of self knowledge blocks the sight of all objects from view, like a veil of thick darkness that hides all things from sight. ²⁹ In this way, one's own attempt exposes himself to the miseries of the world, then he wails at his fate like a foolish monkey that brought on its own destruction by pulling out the peg from the chink in the timber.

³⁸ Therefore shun the sight of what can be seen and repress your fleeting mind by your sober intellect. Diminish your desires for all internal as well as external goods. ³⁹ For though you may practice your austerities for a thousand years and crush your body by falling from a precipice upon stones, ⁴⁰ and although you burn your body alive on a flaming pyre or plunge yourself into the undersea fire, or if you fall in a deep and dark pit or well or rush upon the edge of a drawn and sharp sword, ⁴¹ or if you have Brahma himself or even Shiva for your teacher, or get a very kind and tender hearted ascetic for your religious guide,⁴² or whether you are situated in heaven or on earth or in the hell regions of Patala below, you have no way of liberation except by keeping your desires under control.

⁴⁶ As the mind conceives a thing to be, so it perceives the same in actuality. Therefore, if you want to know the truth of it have no conception of anything.

⁴⁹ We are born to the doom of death, but let us not die to be reborn to the miseries of life and death again. It is for the wise and learned to take themselves to that state which is free from these pains.

⁵⁰ First learn the truth and attain the true knowledge of your soul. Then abandon all your desires and dislikes of the world. Being thus prepared with a dead-like unconsciousness of your internal feelings, you will be able to come to the knowledge of that transcendental state which is full of perfect bliss and blessedness.

Chapter 54 — Dasura Explains: Desires Vanish when You Give Them No Thought

¹ The son asked, “What is this desire, father? How is it produced and grown? How is it destroyed at last?”

² Dasura replied:—

Desire or will is situated in the mind, which is the mental part of the one eternal, universal and spiritual substance of God. ³ Desire gets the form of a monad from a formless unit, then by its gradual expansion extends over the whole mind and fills it like a flimsy cloud soon covers the sky.

⁶ The accumulation of our desires forms the world, just as the accumulation of waters makes the ocean. You have no trouble without your desire. Being free of desire, you are free from the miseries of the world. ⁷ It is by mere chance that we meet the objects of our desire, and an act of unavoidable chance makes us liable to lose them. They appear before us as secondary lights in the sky, then fly away like a mirage vanishes from view. ⁸ As a man who has jaundice from eating a certain fruit sees everything as yellow with his jaundiced eye, so the desire in the heart of man pictures the unreal as a reality before him.

¹³ Try to relinquish your desire and you will evade all difficulties. Cease to think of anything and your desire for it will disappear of itself. ¹⁴ Even the crushing of a flower requires some effort, but it requires no effort to destroy your desire. It vanishes of itself when you lack it thought. ¹⁵ You have to open the palm of your hand to get a hold of a flower, but you have nothing to do to destroy your frail and false desire. ¹⁶ He who wants to destroy his desire can do it in a instant by forgetting the thought of his desired object.

²⁰ Our wishes constitute our minds, hearts, lives, understandings and all our other faculties of desire. These are all only different names for the same thing without any difference in meaning. ²¹ There is no other business of our lives than to desire and to be doing, and when done to be desiring again. As this restless craving is rooted out of the mind, it sets it free from all anxiety.

²⁷ The mind that becomes the living principle stretches out his city of the world by an act of its imagination, then turns it about as the present, past, and future worlds. ²⁸ The mind that is subject to the sensational, emotional and willful feelings loses the purity of its intellectual nature and plays many parts by its sensuousness. ²⁹ The living soul also forgets the nature of the Universal Soul from which it is derived and is transformed to a puny animalcule in the heart of man, where it plays its pranks like an ape in the woods.

³⁶ The mind of a man is like a grain of rice covered under its husk, which is soon husked upon the threshing-floor. ³⁷ The worldliness of the wise is as soon removed like the husk of rice, and the blackness of a cooking kettle. ³⁸ The blemishes of a man are blotted out by his own efforts. Therefore you must try to exert yourself to action at all times.

⁴¹ The world is not yours, nor are you of this world. There is nobody or anything here related to you, nor are you related to any. Never think otherwise or take the false for true. ⁴² Never foster the false idea in your mind that you are master of large possessions and pleasant things. Know yourself and all pleasant things are for the delight of the Supreme Maker and Master of all.

Chapter 55 — Vasishta and Dasura Meet; Further Description of the Kadamba Forest

Hear me, Rama, who is the delight of Raghu's race and shines like the moon in the firmament of Raghu's family. After I heard the conversation between Dasura and his son, ² I descended from the sky to the top of the kadamba tree, which was decorated with its green leaves and beautiful fruits and flowers. Then with my spiritual body, I sat myself slowly and silently on top of the tree, as a light cloud descends on the summit of a mountain.

³ I saw Dasura there, sitting like a giant by subduing the organs of his body and shining with the luster of his penance, like fire blazing with its flame. ⁴ The light issuing from his body reflected purple gold on his seat and lit that spot like sunbeams emblazon the world. ⁵ Seeing me present myself before him, Dasura spread a leafy seat for me to sit down and then honored me according to the rules of ceremonial law. ⁶ Then I joined with the luminous Dasura to continue his discourse, which was meant for the edification of his son and salvation of mankind from the miseries of life.

²¹ The bees, tired with their labor of love, refreshed themselves by sipping the dewdrops trickling on the tops of flowers. Then taking their repast on the starch-like meal, they slept together with their mates in the cells of flower cups. ²² The bee couples living in the flower cells, giddy from sipping the honey of the flower cups, were humming their love tunes to each other.

²⁶ They saw fearless birds chirping on the branches and others sleeping confidently in their nests. They saw the ground covered with living creatures feasting on the ripe fruits that had fallen. ²⁷ They saw long lines of black bees lying mute on the ground like strings of beads, blackening it with their dark bodies. ²⁸ The forest was smelling with fragrance and the sky was covered by a cloud of flowers. The dust of kadamba blossoms colored the ground with a perfumed grey, and kadamba fruit covered the face of the land.

²⁹ What more need be said other than there was no part of the tree which was not useful to living beings. ³⁰ Here deer were sleeping on fallen leaves and there others were resting on the bare ground. Birds sat on the banks and beaches of the streams all about that lofty tree.

³¹ As they were looking at the beauties of the forest in this manner, the night passed away as quickly as a night of festivity. ³² The son of the hermit kept talking with me on many subjects and derived many useful instructions from my teaching. ³³ As we conversed with each other on different subjects, the night passed away as quickly as that of a conjugal pair. ³⁴ Now it began to dawn and blushing flowers began to open their petals while the host of stars on high disappeared from their arena of the sky.

³⁵ I then took my leave and was followed by the hermit and his son for some distance from their kadamba tree, where I left them for my aerial course to the heavenly stream. ³⁶ There, having performed my holy ablution, I came down under the roof of heaven and then entered the celestial region of the sages, which is situated in the midway sky.

³⁷ Now I have related to you, Rama, this story of Dasura that you may learn from his example the unreality of the apparent world which is only a shadow of the ideal one. ³⁸ It was for this reason that I told you what Dasura had said by way of explanation of the phenomenal world as a shadow of the ideal world. ³⁹ Therefore, know the Spirit like Dasura, and imitate his example in the magnanimity of your soul. Forsake the unreal and pursue reality for your permanent delight.

Chapter 56 — The Paradox of the Soul as Passive Cause; Spirit & Corporeality Do Not Mix

Knowing the world to be a nothingness, you must cease to take any delight in it. For what reasonable being is there who would delight in its unreality? ² If you take the phenomenal world for a reality, you may continue to enslave yourself to the unreal material and lose the spiritual nature of your soul. ³ If you know it to be a temporary existence, why should you take any interest in what is so frail and unstable, rather than care for your immortal soul?

¹¹ If the soul is the active power without its organs of action, it must be unfailing and entire because the continuance of its inorganic operations cannot weaken its powers. ¹² Therefore there is an irresistible destiny which is absolutely overruling. The soul is existence and nonexistence itself. It is sedate and continuous, and all visible disturbances are only false appearances.

¹⁴ If we grant that worldly affairs are durable, yet still they are not deserving of your reliance, because what faith can you rely on the union of two opposites such as the mind and matter? ¹⁵ And if the state of worldly things is unsteady and uncertain, it can not be deserving of your confidence. Say, can you be sorry at the dissolving of the foam and froth on milk or water? Then why should you lament at the loss of the perishable?

¹⁷ Although the soul is the agent (or source) of all actions, yet it remains as no agent at all. It is unconnected with its actions, as the lamp with its light. ¹⁸ Doing all it does nothing, like the sun directing the business of the day without doing anything by itself. It moves like the sun without moving from its place, but retains its station in its own orbit.

²⁰ When you have known this for certain by your own proficiency, O Rama, and when you have well ascertained this truth by its clearest evidence, ²¹ you ought no more place any reliance on material things, which are as false as an ambient flame, or a vision in dream, or as any falsehood whatever.

²⁴ Look upon this ideal world (which is born of your brain) as you look upon a creature of your conception, a vision in your dream, an apparition, or the appearance of two moons in the sky by your visual deception. ²⁵ Shun your reliance on the fair creation of your imagination and without minding what you are, conduct yourself cheerfully in your sphere. ²⁶ Shun your desires and the thoughts of your agency, even when you are doing anything at all.

²⁷ It is a general law that the proximity of the cause causes the act, even without the will of the actor, just as the presence of a lamp enlightens the room without the will of the lamp. ²⁸ Look at the kurchi tree blooming and blossoming under the influence of heavy clouds, and not of its own accord. So it is destined for the three worlds to appear to sight under the influence of the Supreme Being. ²⁹ As the appearance of the sun in the sky employs all beings to their daily duties without his will or command, so the omnipresence of God causes the actions of all beings of their own spontaneity and without his will, act or fiat. ³⁰ And as a bright gem reflects its light without any will on its part, so the mere existence of God causes the existence of all worlds.

³¹ Thus are causality and its lack both situated in your soul, which therefore is called the cause of your actions because of its presence in the body, but in no way its cause owing to its lack of will. ³² The entity of the soul being beyond the perception of sense, it is neither the agent nor recipient of any action. But being confined in the conscious body, it is thought to be both an active and passive agent. ³³ Thus the properties of both causality and its lack reside in the soul. You may take it in any light you want for your purpose and rest content with your belief. ³⁴ But firmly believing yourself to be situated in the body doing actions without thinking of yourself as their author will save you from the guilt of all your acts.

³⁷ But if you wish to remain Rama with your high ambition of doing everything in the world, that is also good, and you may try to do that. ³⁸ But if I do not fall into such a great error as to have this high aspiration of yours, then I am never liable to the passions of anger, enmity, and other violent emotions in this world.

³⁹ The bodies that we bear are nourished by some and burned by others. Such being the state of our own being, we have no cause for our joy or sorrow in it. ⁴⁰ Knowing ourselves to be the authors of our own happiness and misery, and knowing that we are the causes for the rise and dissolution of the world in our view, we have no reason to be joyful or sorry about it. ⁴¹ When we have that sweet composure which is a balm to all the diseases in our soul, then there is an end of the joys and sorrows of our own making. ⁴² Fellow feeling for all living beings makes the best state of the mind. The soul that is so disposed is not subject to reincarnation.

⁴³ Rama, make this the best lesson for your conduct in life, that with all your activities you continue to think yourself as no actor at all. ⁴⁴ Remain quiet and steady as you are by resigning all things to themselves. Never think that it is you who does or undoes anything. ⁴⁵ But if you look to the different ways in which you do one thing or the other, then you can have no rest or quiet but must run in the way that leads to the trap of perpetual struggle and misery.

⁴⁹ Rama, remain in that best and blessed state in which the wisest, best and holiest of men have found their rest. It is the constant habit of thinking yourself as nothing and not doing anything, or that you are all things and are doing everything as the Supreme Soul knows itself to be, or that you are some person having a personality of your own, and yet nobody.

Chapter 57 — The Question of Duality again Deferred; First Avoid Desire

¹ Rama said, “Your words, O brahmin, are true and well spoken. I find the soul to be the inactive agent of actions, the impassive recipient of their effects, and the spiritual cause of the corporeal. ² I find the soul to be the sole lord of all and omnipresent in its course. It has the nature of consciousness and the form of transparency. It resides in all bodies, as the five elements compose the bodies of land and sea. ³ Now I come to understand the nature of Brahman. I am as pacified by your speech as the heated mountain is cooled by rainwater.”

⁴ “From its seclusion and unwillingness, the soul neither does nor receives anything, but its universal action of pervading makes it both the actor and sufferer. ⁵ But sage, there is a question too vivid and irritating in my mind. I pray you remove it by your enlightened speech, as moonbeams dispel the darkness of the night. ⁶ Tell me sage, where do these dualities come from? There is the reality of one and the unreality of the other, and that this is “I” and that is not me. If the soul is one and indivisible, how is this one thing and that another? ⁷ There being but one self-existent and self-evident soul from the beginning, how does it become subject to these opposites, like the bright disc of sun comes to be hidden under clouds?”

⁸ Vasishta answered:—

Rama, I will give the correct answer to this question of yours when I come to my conclusion. Then you will learn the cause of these dualities. ⁹ Rama, you will not be able to comprehend my answers to these questions until you become acquainted with my solution to the question of liberation.

¹⁰ Only an adult youth can appreciate the beauty of a love song. So it is that only a holy man can grasp the sense of what I say about these abstruse subjects. ¹¹ Sayings of such great importance are as fruitless with ignorant people as a work on erotic subjects is useless to children. ¹² There is a time and a season for every subject for men, just as autumn produces the harvest and not spring. ¹³ The preaching of a sermon is selectable for old men like fine colorings are suitable for clean canvas. So a spiritual discourse of deep sense suits one who has known the Spirit.

¹⁴ A little earlier I mentioned something which may serve to answer your question, although you have not fully comprehended its meaning. ¹⁵ When you come to know the Spirit in your own spirit, you will doubtlessly come to find the answer to your question by yourself. ¹⁶ I will fully expound on the subject of your question at the conclusion of my argument when you have arrived at a better knowledge of these things. ¹⁷ The spiritual man knows the spirit in his own spirit, and it is the good grace of the Supreme Spirit to manifest itself to the spirit of the spiritual man.

¹⁸ Rama, I have already described the argument concerning the agency and inertness of the soul, yet it is your ignorance of this doctrine that makes you foster doubts. ¹⁹ The man bound to his desires is a bondsman, and one freed from them is said to be set free from his slavery. Cast away your desires and you will have no cause to seek freedom. ²⁰ First forsake your foul desires, then be free from your desire of worldly possessions. Then foster your better wishes, and at last incline to your pure and holy leanings. ²¹ After having conducted yourself with pure desires, get rid of even these at the end. Then being freed from all desires, be inclined towards and united with your intellect. ²² Then renounce your intellectual propensity, together with your mental and conscious inclinations, and finally having reached the state of settled tranquility, get rid of your mind also in order to set yourself free from all other desires.

²³ Be an intellectual being and continue to breathe your vital breath. But keep your imagination under control and take no account of the course of time or the revolution of days and nights. ²⁴ Forsake your desire for the objects of sense and root out your sense of individual ego which is the root of desire. Let your understanding be calm and quiet and you will be honored by all. ²⁵ Drive away all feelings and thoughts from your heart and mind, for he who is free from anxieties is superior to all.

²⁸ A man may have well studied the scriptures, and discussed about them in conversation, yet he is far from perfection without perfect renunciation and silence. ²⁹ There are men who have examined everything and wandered in all parts of the world, but there are few who have known the truth. ³⁰ Of all things observed in the world, there is nothing that may be truly desirable and is sought after by the wise. ³¹ All this excitement of the world and all the pursuits of men tend only towards the support of the animal body. There is nothing in the world that leads to the edification of the rational soul.

³⁴ A man may be lord of the world or he may pierce through the clouds and search heaven (by yoga), yet he cannot enjoy the solace of his soul without his knowledge of it. ³⁵ I admire those high minded men who have bravely subdued their senses. It is from them that we have the remedy to remove the curse of our repeated births. ³⁶ I see every place filled by the five elements, and a sixth is not to be seen anywhere in the world. Such being the case everywhere, what else can I expect to find in earth or heaven or in the regions below?

⁴⁰ How can anyone live and enjoy the blessings of this world for a whole kalpa when he can not escape the sorrow consequent on the loss of all his friends during that period? ⁴¹ He who has known the self has no craving for heavenly bliss within himself because he knows his gain of all the three worlds can never lead to the strengthening of his soul. ⁴² But the avaricious are not content with all they have and like the body of this earth, is not full with all its hills and mountains and surrounding seas. ⁴³ There is nothing in this earth or in the upper and lower worlds which is of any use to the sage acquainted with spiritual knowledge.

⁵⁶ No worldly pleasure can gladden the soul of the wise man, just as the dance of monkeys can give no joy to the heart of Shiva which delights in the dancing of Parvati. ⁵⁷ No earthly delight can have its seat in the heart of the wise, as sunlight is never reflected in a gem hidden under a bushel.

⁵⁸ The material world appears to be a solid rock to the unmoved ignorant, but it seems like a fleeting wave to the wise. The ignorant take great pleasure in the transitory enjoyments of the world, but the wise take them to no account, as a swan despises to look upon the moss of a lake.

Chapter 58 — The Song of Kacha

Regarding this subject, Rama, I will tell you the holy song sung of old by Kacha, the son of Brihaspati, the teacher of the gods.

² This son of the divine tutor lived in a grove in some part of Mount Meru where by means of his holy meditation he found the tranquility of his spirit in the Supreme Soul. ³ His mind being filled with the ambrosial nectar of divine knowledge, he derived no satisfaction at the sight of the visible world composed of the five elements. ⁴ Being rapt in his mind with the vision of the Holy Spirit, he saw nothing else beside him. Then he fervently uttered to himself the following joyful song.

⁵ “What is there for me to do, refuse, receive or reject, and what place is there for me to go or refrain from going when this whole is filled by Divine Spirit like the water of the great deluge? ⁶ I find pleasure and pain inherent in the soul and the sky and all its sides contained in the magnitude of the soul. Thus knowing all things to be full of the Holy Spirit, I forget and sink all my pains in my spirit. ⁷ The Spirit is inside and outside of all bodies. It is above and below and on all sides of all. Here, there and everywhere is the same Spirit. There is no place where it is not. ⁸ The Spirit abides everywhere and all things abide in the Spirit. All things are the same with the Spirit and I am situated in the same Spirit. ⁹ There is nothing intelligent or unconscious which is not the Spirit. All is Spirit and so am I also. Spirit fills the whole space and is situated in every place. ¹⁰ I am as full of that Spirit and its indescribable bliss as the all encompassing water of the great deluge.”

This was how Kacha was thinking in the dwelling of the golden mountain. ¹¹ He uttered the sound Om, and it rang on all sides like the ringing of a bell. First he first uttered the vowel “O” and then the nasal “m” which tops it like a tuft of hair. He remained meditating on the spirit in his mind, not as situated in or without it.

¹² Rama, thus did Kacha continue to think in himself and chant his holy hymn, being freed from the foulness of flesh and rarefied in his spirit like the breath of the wind. His soul was as clear as the sky in autumn after the dark clouds of the rainy season are dispersed.

Chapter 59 — How Brahma Creates and Sustains

There is nothing in this world except the gratification of carnal desires and the pleasure of eating, drinking and lust with the vulgar. But the good and great desire the lasting good of men.

² Crooked and creeping beings and things, beasts and wicked men, and ignorant people are gratified only with carnal pleasures. They are all fond of everything that is conducive to their bodily enjoyments. ³ They are human asses who dote on the beauty of female bodies which are no better than lumps of flesh, blood and bones. ⁴ This may be desirable to dogs and devouring animals, but not to man. All animals have fleshy bodies, just as trees have trunks of wood and minerals their forms of earth.

¹⁰ Wise men take no delight in this unreal and unstable world which is more poisonous than poison itself and is able to infect even those who have not tasted the bitter affliction of grief. ¹¹ Because the thought of your materiality has taken possession of your mind, forsake your desire of enjoyment and seek to be united with your spiritual essence.

¹² Whenever the thought of making the unreal world arises in the mind of Brahma the Creator, he takes an unreal body upon himself of his own will. ¹³ It becomes as bright as gold by his own light, then he is called Virinchi on account of his will, and he is also called Brahma because he is born of Brahma.

¹⁴ Rama asked, "How does the world become a solid substance from having been a visionary form in the spirit or mind of God?"

¹⁵ Vasishta replied:—

When the lotus-born Brahma rose from his cradle of the embryo of Brahma, he uttered the name of Brahman, which is why he was called Brahma. ¹⁶ He then had the conception of the world in his own imagination, and that conception assumed a visible and solid form by the power of his will. It is called the conceptional or ideal world.

form and produced it as the four-faced Brahma. ²⁰ Then the sun sprung forth from that light and shone like a globe of gold amidst his world-encircling beams. ²¹ He held the locks of his flaming hair on his head, which flashed like fire all around him and filled the sphere of heaven with heat and light.

²⁵ Then Brahma remembered the eternal Vedas and the many ceremonial rites which he established as laws in his house of this world. ²⁶ Having taken the gigantic body of Brahma and the extensive form of the mind, he produced the visible world as his own offspring. ²⁷ He stretched seas and mountains, and made trees and upper worlds. He raised Mount Meru on the surface of the earth and all the forests and groves upon it. ²⁸ It was he who ordained happiness and misery, birth and death, and disease and decay. He created the passions and feelings of living beings under their threefold divisions of sattva, rajas and tamas.

²⁹ Whatever has been created by the hands (faculties) of the mind of Brahma, the same continues to be perceived by our deluded vision. ³⁰ He gave the mind and laws to all beings and he makes the worlds again as they are situated in his mind.

³¹ Therefore it is error that has given rise to the false conception of the eternity of the world. It is the conception of the mind alone that creates the ideal forms. ³² The acts of all things in the world are produced by their conception and wishes. It is the concept or thought that binds even the gods to their destiny.

³³ The great Brahma that was the source of the creation of the world sits in a meditative mood contemplating on everything that he has made. ³⁴ It was by a motion of the mind that the wonderful form of the living principle was formed, and it was this that gave rise to the whole world with all its changing phenomena. ³⁵ A motion of the mind made the gods Indra, Upendra and Mahendra and others, as it did the hills and seas in all the worlds above and below us, and in the ten sides of the heaven above.

³⁶ Then Brahma thought in himself, "I have thus stretched out at large the network of my desire. I will now cease from extending the objects of my desire any further." ³⁷ Being so determined, he ceased from the toil of his creation and reflected on the eternal Spirit within his own spirit. ³⁸ By knowing the Spirit, his mind was melted down by its brightness and reclined on it with the same ease as one finds in his soft sleep after long labor. ³⁹ Being freed from his selfishness and egoism, he felt that perfect tranquility which the soul receives by resting in itself and which is like the calm sea after it subsides in itself.

welfare and for their guidance, he promulgates sacred scriptures and rites which are full of meaning.⁴³ He propounds the Vedas and their branches, the Vedangas, which are filled with spiritual knowledge and the teachings of wisdom. He revealed the Puranas and other scriptures for the salvation of mankind.

⁴⁴ Again the spirit of Brahma reclined on the Supreme Spirit and was relieved from its toil. He remained as tranquil as the calmed ocean after it was churned by Mandara Mountain.⁴⁵ Brahma having observed the efforts of mankind on earth, and having prescribed to them the rules of their conduct, returned to himself where he sat reclined on his lotus seat.

⁴⁶ Sometimes he remains entirely devoid of all his desires. At other times, from his great kindness, he takes his cares for mankind upon himself.

⁵² After creation of the material world by the rajas (active) nature of Brahma, there rises the visible madhyanika creation in the air by the will of the creator.⁵³ In the next step of animal creation, some were born as gods and others as yaksha demigods, and this is called suranika because the suras or gods were created in it.

⁵⁴ Every creature is born in the shape of its inherent nature, then it is either elevated or degraded according to the nature of its associations. It also lays the foundation of its future state of bondage to birth or liberation by its acts commenced in the present life.

⁵⁵ In this manner, O Rama, the world has come to existence. Its creation is evidently a work of labor, as it is brought into being by various acts of motion and exertion of the body and mind. All these products of the god's will are sustained by continuous force and effort on his part.

Chapter 60 — Production of Sattvic and Rajas-Sattvic Beings

O strong armed Rama, after the great father of creation took himself to his activity, he formed and supported the worlds by his energy and might. ² All living and departed souls are tied like buckets to the rope of their desire and made to rise and fall in this old well of the world by the law of their predetermined destiny.

³ All beings proceeding from Brahma and entering the prison house of the world have to be concentrated into the body of the air-born Brahma, just as all the waters of the sea have to be whirled into the whirlpool in the sea. ⁴ Others are continually springing from the mind of Brahma, like sparks of fire struck out of a red-hot iron, while many are flying into it as their common center.

¹⁷ One that has received no bodily form and moves without manifesting itself is said to be a satya (truth) or spiritual being and has a large scope of action. ¹⁸ He who gets his liberation in or after his lifetime is said to have a pure (sattvika) birth, but whoever is obliged to be reborn by his acts is said to belong to the active-pure (rajas-sattvika) class. ¹⁹ Anyone of this class who is born to rule over others becomes giddy with pride (tamas, passive) is said to be of the nature of ignorance (tamasika). I will now speak of this class of beings.

²⁰ Those originally born with pure (sattvika) nature are pure in their conduct and have never to be born again. ²¹ Men of active-pure (rajas-sattvika) temperament have to be reborn on earth, but being elevated by their reasoning powers, they have no more to be born in this lower world. ²² Those who have directly proceeded from the Supreme Spirit (without any mixture of these natures) are men filled with every quality and are very rare on earth.

²⁵ It is by your ignorance of the Supreme that you behold the vast extent of the world, but by considering it rightly, you will soon find all this to be only the one unity.

Chapter 61 — Rajas and Sattva Qualities to Be Desired

Those who are born with the nature of rajas-sattva remain highly pleased in the world and are as happy on their faces as the face of the sky with the serene light of moonbeams. ² Their faces are not darkened by melancholy but are as bright as the face of heaven. They are never exposed to troubles, like lotus flowers are exposed to night frost. ³ They never deviate from their even nature, but remain unmoved like immovable bodies. They persist in their course of beneficence, like trees yielding their fruit to all.

⁸ You must always walk in the way of the godly and not run to the sea of dangers. You should go in life this way without pain or sorrow. ⁹ Your soul will be as elevated in the rajasic and sattvic states by avoiding the ways of the ungodly and considering well the teachings of the scriptures. ¹⁰ Consider well in your mind the frail acts that are attended with various evils. Do those acts which are good for the three worlds, both in their beginning and end and forever to eternity.

¹¹ The intelligent, because they are free from narrow views, think that false mental images, the offspring of ignorance, are dangerous to them and not otherwise. ¹² For the enlightenment of your understanding, you should always remember and say, “O Lord! What am I, and where does this multiplicity of worlds come from?” ¹³ By diligently considering these subjects in the society of the wise and righteous, you must neither be engaged in your ceremonial acts nor continue in your unnecessary practices of rituals. ¹⁴ You must look at the disconnectedness of all things in the world from you and seek to associate with the righteous, like peacock yearning for rainy clouds.

¹⁸ The empty space of Divine Consciousness contains the whole universe just like the emptiness of air contains the glorious sun, and like the hollow of the earth contains an ant. ¹⁹ The same air fills the cavity of every pot on earth, so it is the one and the same consciousness and spirit of God which fills, enlivens and sustains all bodies in every place. ²⁰ As the ideas of sweet and sour are the same in all men, so the consciousness of the Intellect is alike in all mankind. ²¹ There being only one real substance in existence, it is a tangible error for ignorant folks to say, “This one exists and the other perishes or vanishes away.”

²² There is no such thing at anytime, Rama, which being once produced is resolved into nothing. All these are neither realities nor unrealities, only representations or reflections of the Real One.

²⁴ Why, O Rama! should anybody suffer himself to be deluded by these unrealities? All these accompaniments here are no better than causes of our delusion. ²⁵ The accompaniment of unrealities tends only to our delusion here. If they are taken for realities, to what good do they tend other than to delude us the more?

Chapter 62 — Vasishta Exhorts Rama How to Conduct Himself

¹ The diligent and rational inquirer after truth has a natural tendency to rely on the company of the wise and the well matured guru, and discusses matters of the scriptures by the rules of the scriptures he has learned before, and not talk randomly. ² In this way, by discussing the abstract science of yoga with the good and great and un-avaricious learned, he can attain true wisdom.

³ The man who is so acquainted with the true sense of the scriptures and qualified by his habit of dispassion in the society of holy men shines as the model of intelligence, like yourself. ⁴ Your liberal mindedness and self-reliance, combined with your cool headedness and all other virtues, have set you above the reach of misery and all mental affliction, and also has freed you from future reincarnation by your attainment of liberation in this life. ⁵ Truly have you become like the autumn sky cleared of its gloomy clouds. You are freed from worldly cares and you are filled with the best and highest wisdom.

⁶ He is truly liberated whose mind is freed from the fluctuations of its thoughts and from the flights and fumes of its thickening fancies and ever crowding particulars. ⁷ Henceforward all men on earth will try to imitate the noble disposition of the equanimity of your mind, which is devoid of its passions of love and hatred, as also of affection and enmity.

¹⁰ Live as long as you have to live in this frail body of yours and keep your passions and feelings under the sway of your reason. Act according to the rules of society and keep your desires under subjection. ¹¹ Enjoy the perfect peace and tranquility of the righteous and wise, and avoid both the cunning of fox-like deceivers of others and the silly foolishness of children.

¹² Men who imitate the purity of manners and conduct of those who are born with the property of goodness also acquire the purity of their lives in process of time. ¹³ The man who is habituated in the practice of manners and the modes of life of another person is soon changed to that mode of life, though he be of a different nature or of another species of being.

¹⁸ Those of the best kind on earth long for their liberation in future, which also requires the exertion of tapas and meditation for its attainment. ¹⁹ There is nothing in this earth or below or in the heaven or the celestials above which is unattainable to a concerned man through his self-efforts. ²⁰ It is impossible for you to obtain the object of your desire without the exercise of your patience and dispassion, and through the exertion of your prowess and austerities of celibacy (brahmacharya, a chaste student). Nor is it possible to succeed in anything without the right use of reason. ²¹ Try to know yourself and do good to all creatures by your courage. Employ your good understanding to drive away all your cares and sorrows. In this way you will be liberated from all pain and sorrow.

²² O Rama who is filled with all admirable qualities and endowed with the high power of reason, keep yourself steady in acts of goodness and never may the false cares of this world overtake you in your future life.

BOOK V
On Dissolution, Becoming Quiet
(Upasama Khanda)

The previous section on firm abidance set out the goal of abiding in the atman. The upasanti prakarana gives instruction on the ways and means for attaining that goal.

The chief obstacle to Self realization is the false identification of the atman with the body (dehatmabodha). This false identification is the result of ahamkara or the ego sense. This section gives practical guidance to eliminate ones identification with the ego and describes a number of methods and yogic processes for this purpose. The major ones are inquiry into the true nature of the Self (vichara), seeing all creation equally as varied manifestations of the one brahman or God (samadarsana), considering oneself as pure consciousness (chit) in all conditions of life and at all times, and performing ones allotted duties in life without any attachment. When as a result of these practices a person becomes perfectly unattached to the fruits of actions (asanga), all attachments, aversions and fears disappear and the person becomes qualified for attaining the samadhi stage.

Chapter 1 — The Midday Ritual

Rama, now hear me propose to you the subject of quietude or rest, which follows that of existence and sustenance of the universe. This knowledge will lead you to nirvana, final extinction.

² Valmiki says:—

As Vasishta was delivering his holy words, the assembly of the princes remained as still as the stars in the clear sky of an autumn night. ³ Listening princes, looking with muted gaze at the venerable sage amidst the assembly, resembled the unmoving lotuses looking at the bright sun from their breathless beds. ⁴ Harem princesses forgot their joy at hearing the sermon of the sage. Their minds became as cool and quiet as in the long absence of their consorts. ⁵ Ladies fanning with fans in their hands remained as still as a flock of flapping geese resting on a lotus bed, and the jingling of gems and jewels on their arms ceased like the chirping of birds on the trees at night. ⁶ The princes who heard these doctrines sat reflecting on their hidden meanings, their index fingers to the tips of their noses in thoughtfulness. Others pondered on their deep sense by laying fingers on their lips.

¹⁷ Hearing the midday shout, the sage stopped for a moment. After the noisy confusion was over he addressed Rama and said:—

¹⁸ Rama, thus far I have delivered to you my daily lecture for this day. I will resume it next morning and tell you all that I have to say on the subject. ¹⁹ It is ordained for the twice born classes (dvijas, the three upper castes) to attend to their religious duties at midday. The lecture does not require us to swerve from discharging our noonday services at this time. ²⁰ Rise therefore, O fortunate Rama, and perform your sacred ablutions and divine services with which you are well acquainted and give your alms and charities also as they are ordained by law.

³⁷ The venerable Vishwamitra, being invited by the king and Vasishtha, stayed and passed the night at Vasishtha's home. ³⁸ Vasishtha was honored by all the princes, sages and great brahmins, and adored by Rama and the other princes of King Dasharata's royal family. ³⁹ Then Vasishtha proceeded to his hermitage, with the obeisance of the assembled crowd on all sides, and followed by a large retinue just as the god Brahma is accompanied by bodies of celestials. ⁴⁰ He then gave leave to Rama and his brother princes, and to all his companions and followers, to return to their homes from his hermitage in the woods. ⁴¹ He bade farewell to the aerial, earthly and underground beings that kept him company with their formal praise of his merits. Then entering his house, he performed his brahmin rites with a dutiful disposition.

Chapter 2 — That Night Rama Ponders Vasishtha's Lectures

After the moon-bright princes returned to their residence, they performed their daily services according to the daily ritual. ² Vasishtha and the other saints, sages, and brahmins, even the king and princes, were all engaged in their holy services at their own houses. ³ They bathed in sacred streams and fountains filled with floating lotuses and other aquatic plants, their edges frequented by reddish geese, cranes and storks. ⁴ After they had performed their ablutions, they made donations of lands, cattle, seats and beddings, sesame grains, gold and gems, and food and clothing to the holy brahmins. ⁵ Then in their own houses, they worshipped the gods Vishnu and Shiva in their temples and made offerings to the sun and the rulers of the skies with offerings of the gold and gems that are sacred to the particular gods and planets.

But Rama kept awake in his bed, meditating on all things he had heard from the sage. ¹³ He continued to reflect on Vasishtha's lectures which appeared as charming to him like the cry of a parent elephant brings joy to its tender young.

Rama's thoughts:—

¹⁴ What does this wandering of ours in this world mean? Why are all these men and other animals bound to make their entrances and exits in this fleeting theatre? ¹⁵ What is the form of our mind and how is it to be governed? What is this illusion (maya) of the world? From where did it rise and how is it to be avoided? ¹⁶ What is the good or evil of getting rid of this illusion, and how does it cover and overpower the soul? Can it be made to leave by any means in our power? ¹⁷ What did the muni say with regard to the means and effect of curbing the desires of the mind? What did he say regarding restraining of our organs? And what about the tranquility of the soul?

¹⁸ Our hearts and minds, our living souls and their delusion tend to stretch out the phenomenal world before us. Our own souls make a reality of unreal existence. ¹⁹ All these things are linked together in our minds and are weakened only by the weakening of our mental desires. But how are these to be avoided in order to get rid of our misery? ²⁰ The slender light of reason is over-shadowed, like a single crane in the air, by the dark cloud of passions and desires. Then how am I to distinguish right from wrong, like a goose separates milk from water?

²¹ It is as hard to shun our desires and it is impossible to avoid our troubles here without the utter annihilation of our desire. Here is difficulty in either of two ways. ²² On the one hand, the mind leads us to spiritual knowledge. On the other, the mind seduces us to worldliness. We know not which way to be led by it. The difficulty is as great as a man climbing a mountain or a child escaping from his fear of a yaksha spirit.

²³ All worldly turmoil ends upon attainment of true joy, just as the anxieties of a maiden are over after she has obtained a husband. ²⁴ When will my anxieties become still and when will my cares come to an end? When will my soul have its holiness and my mind find its rest from acts of merit and demerit?

²⁵ When shall I rest in that state of bliss which is as cooling and complete in itself as the full moon with all her digits? When shall I wander about the earth at large, free from worldly cares and ties?

²⁶ When will my fancy stop from its flight and concentrate on the inner soul? When will my mind be absorbed in the Supreme Soul, like a turbulent wave existing in the breast of the quiet sea? ²⁷ When shall I get over this wide ocean of the world, which is disturbed by the turbulent waves of our desires and is full of the hungry crocodiles of our greedy greed? When will I rid myself of this feverish passion? ²⁸ When shall I rest in that state of complete, unemotional stillness of mind which is the goal of those who seek liberation and of the all-tolerant and indifferent philosopher?

²⁹ Ah, when will this continuous fever of my worldliness decrease? It has irritated my whole body by its inward heat and has deranged my humors out of their order! ³⁰ When will this heart of mine cease to throb from its cares, like the light of a lamp ceasing to flutter without wind? When will my understanding gain its light after dispersing the gloom of my ignorance? ³¹ When will these organs and body parts gain their respite from their constant functions? When will this parched frame of mine get over the sea of greed, like a garuda crossing oceans with ease? ³² When will the light of reason, like the clear atmosphere of the autumn sky, dispel this dark cloud of my ignorance that envelopes my heavenly essence under the veil of this sorry and miserable form?

³³ Our minds are filled with the weeds of mandara plants of the Nandana pleasure-garden of paradise. But my soul yearns for its restitution in the Supreme Spirit. ³⁴ The dispassionate man is said to be set in the pure light of reason. Therefore, I long to attain that passionless state of my mind. ³⁵ But my restless mind has made me a prey to the python snake of grief, and I cry out in my sorrow, "O my father and mother! Help me to get out of this difficulty!"

³⁶ I also exclaim, "O my sister understanding! Consent to comply with the request of your poor brother, and consider well the words of the wise sage for our deliverance from misery. ³⁷ I also call you also to my aid, O my good sense, and beg of you, O progeny of your virtuous mother, to remain firm by my side as I struggle to break the bonds of the world."

³⁸ Let me first reflect on what the sage said about renunciation (vairagya), then on the conduct of one who longs for his liberation, and next about the creation of the world. ³⁹ Afterwards let me remember all that he said on the existence of the universe, together with his beautiful illustrations, all of which are filled with sound wisdom and deep philosophy. ⁴⁰ Although a lesson may be repeated a hundred times over, it proves to be of no effect unless it is considered with good understanding and the right sense of its meaning. Otherwise, it is like the empty sound of autumn clouds without a drop of rain.

Chapter 3 — Description of the Royal Assembly

In this manner, Rama passed the long night with his lengthy series of reflections, eagerly awaiting dawn, like a lotus longing for the rising sun at daybreak. ² Gradually the stars faded away at the appearance of the rising morning light in the east. The face of the sky became dimly pale before it was washed over with the white of twilight. ³ The beating of morning drums and the alarm of trumpets roused Rama from his thoughts. He rose with his moonlike face blooming like a full blown lotus in its leafy bed. ⁴ He performed his morning ablution and devotion, then joined his brothers and a few attendants to go to the hermitage of sage Vasishtha.

²¹ Queens and princesses sat at the windows to see the assembly in the outer hall. They sat upon their couches in the inner apartment which was spread over with flowers. ²² They saw everything by the light of the sun which shining through the lattice work of the windows. They also saw by the radiance of the gems sparkling on their delicate bodies. Attendant women remained silent, without waving their fans or chowries.

²⁶ The sky was covered with golden dust carried by fluttering bees from the cups of the starch-like lotuses where they had been enclosed at night. Soft airs blew the tinkling sound of ringing bells hanging on strings in the door ways of houses. ²⁷ The morning breeze was now blowing with the fragrance of various flowers, mixing with the perfume of sandal paste, and making bees fly and flutter on all sides with their sweet humming music.

Chapter 4 — Dasharata's Praise; Rama Asks Vasishta to Continue

Then King Dasharata made this speech to the chief of sages, speaking in a voice that sounded like a deep cloud and in words equally graceful as they were worthy of confidence.

Dasharata speaking:—

² Venerable sage, your speech of yesterday speaks of your intellectual light. It reveals that you have overcome all afflictions by your extremely emaciating austerities. ³ Yesterday's words have delighted us by their discernment and gracefulness, as if by a shower of enlivening ambrosia. ⁴ The pure words of the wise are as cooling and edifying to the inner soul as clear and nectar-like moonbeams. They both serve to cool and dispel the gloom of the earth. ⁵ The good sayings of the great give the highest joy resulting from imparting a knowledge of the Supreme and by immediately dispelling the gloom of ignorance. ⁶ The knowledge of the inestimable gem of our soul is the best light that we can have in this world. The learned man is like a tree covered by the vines of reason and good sense. ⁷ The sayings of the wise serve to purge our improper desires and doings, as moonbeams dispel the thick gloom of night.

¹² O my Rama! Those days spent attending on the wise are truly cheerful. Otherwise, the rest of the days of one's lifetime are indeed dark and dismal. ¹³ O my lotus-eyed Rama, ask now what more you need to know about the imperishable soul, as the sage is favorably disposed to tell you everything.

Valmiki speaking:—

¹⁴ After the king had ended his speech, the venerable and high minded sage Vasishta, who was seated before Rama, addressed him.

¹⁵ Vasishta said:—

O Rama, the moon of your race, do you remember all that I have told you so far? Have you reflected on the meaning of my sayings from first to last? ¹⁶ Do you recollect, O victor of your enemies, the subject of creation and its division into the triple nature of goodness and all, and their subdivision into various kinds? ¹⁷ Do you remember what I said regarding the one in all, and not as the all, and the one Reality ever appearing as unreality? Do you retain in your mind the nature and form of the Supreme Spirit that I have expounded to you? ¹⁸ Do you, O righteous Rama who is deserving of every praise, bear in your mind how this world came to appear from the Lord God of all? ¹⁹ Do you fully retain in your memory the nature of illusion, and how it is destroyed by the efforts of the understanding, and how the Infinite and Eternal appears as finite and temporal in space and time?

²⁰ Do you, O blessed Rama, keep in your mind that man is no other than his mind, as I have explained to you by proper definition and arguments? ²¹ Have you, Rama, considered well the meanings of my words, and did you reflect in your mind at night yesterday's reasoning?

²² It is by repeated reflection in the mind and learning by heart what you have learnt that you derive the benefit of your learning, and not by negligently laying it aside. ²³ You are a proper receptacle for learning only when you retain a rational discourse and a holy sermon like brilliant pearls in the chest of your capacious and reasoning breast.

²⁴ Valmiki said:—

Rama being thus addressed by the sage, the valiant progeny of the lotus-seated Brahma found his time to answer him in the following manner.

²⁵ Rama replied:—

O sage who is acquainted with all scriptures and creeds, you have expounded sacred truths to me. I have, O noble sage, fully comprehended their meaning. ²⁶ I have deposited everything that you said verbatim in the casket of my heart. I have well considered the meaning of your words during the stillness of my sleepless night. ²⁷ Your words like sunbeams dispel the darkness of the world. Your radiant words of yesterday delighted me like the rays of the rising sun.

²⁸ O great sage, I have carefully preserved the substance of all your past lectures in my mind, as one preserves the most valuable and brilliant gems in a safe. ²⁹ What accomplished man is there who will not bear on his head the blessings of admonitions so very pure and holy, and so very charming and delightful at the same time? ³⁰ We have shaken off the dark veil of the ignorance of this world and have become as enlightened by your favor as autumn days after rain clouds disperse. ³¹ First your instructions are sweet and graceful, then they are enlightening in the middle, then at the end they are sacred by the holiness they confer. ³² Your flowery speech is always delightful to us by the quality of its blooming and unfading beauty, and by virtue of it conferring our lasting good on us.

Chapter 5 — Lecture on Tranquility of the Soul and Mind

Now listen with attention to the subject of tranquility for your own good. In it you will find the best answers.

² Rama, know that this world is a continuous illusion upheld by men of active (rajas) and passive (tamas) natures. The properties of action and passions (rajas) and ignorance (tamas) support this illusory fabric, like pillars supporting a building. ³ Men born with the sattvic nature of goodness, like yourself, easily lay aside this deep-rooted illusion like a snake sluffing off its time-worn skin. ⁴ But wise men of good (sattvic) dispositions, and those of the mixed natures of goodness and action (rajas-sattva) always think about the structure of the world and its prior and future states.

¹² Rama said, "I am fully persuaded to believe, sage, that the mind is the active agent in this world and is subject to decay and death. ¹³ But tell me sage, what are the surest means of guarding the mind from illusion, because only you are the sun to remove the darkness of Raghu's race."

¹⁴ Vasishta replied:—

The best way to guard the mind from delusion is first the knowledge of the scriptures. Next is the exercise of dispassion, then the company of the good, all of which lead the mind towards its purity.

²⁰ The reasonable man distinguishes truth from untruth like a goldsmith separating gold from ashes.

But the unreasonable are like the ignorant, incapable of distinguishing one from the other.

²¹ The Divine Spirit is imperishable once it is known to the human soul. Error can have no access to the soul as long as it is enlightened by the light of the Divine Spirit. ²² The mind ignorant of truth is ever liable to error, but when acquainted with truth, it becomes free from its doubts and is set beyond the reach of error.

²³ O you men who are not acquainted with the Divine Spirit, you bear your souls only for your own misery, but knowing the spirit, you become entitled to eternal happiness and tranquility. ²⁴ How you are lost to your souls by blending with your bodies! Expand the soul from under the earthly frame and you will be quite at rest with yourselves.

³³ Men commonly attribute pleasure and pain to the soul, but they are as separate from it as raindrops and flying dust in the sky are different from each other. ³⁴ Neither the body nor the soul is subject to pain or pleasure, all of which relate to the ignorance of the mind. This ignorance being removed, it will be found that they belong to neither.

³⁸ The spirit and the material world are not the same thing. The spirit is the true reality, and the duality of the world is only a representation or counterpart of the Spirit. ³⁹ But Brahman is the whole totality of existence, and know that the universe is the expansion of the Universal Soul. Therefore, O Rama, give up your error of distinguishing one thing from another.

⁴⁰ Rama, there can be no distinction in the everlasting and all extensive fullness of Brahman, just as there is no difference in the water of the wide extended ocean. ⁴¹ All things being one and alike in the identical substratum of the Supreme Soul, you cannot conceive of there being any other thing in it, just as you cannot imagine a particle of frost to abide in fire. ⁴² By meditating on the Supreme Soul in yourself and by contemplation of the intelligent Spirit in your own intellect, you will find the glory of the Supreme Spirit shining brightly in your pure spirit.

⁴³ Therefore ease your mind, O Rama, and know that there is no mistake or error in believing the all as one and that there is no new birth or new born being. All is ever existent in the Supreme. ⁴⁴ Ease yourself, O Rama, by knowing that there is no duality and that there is no opposite of things, except their oneness in the Divine unity. Then knowing yourself as a spiritual being situated in the purity of Divine essence, you shall have no need of meditation or adoration. Knowing that you are not separated from God, forsake all your sorrow.

⁴⁵ Be tolerant, composed and even-minded. Remain tranquil, silent and meek in your mind. Be as a rich jewel, shining with your internal light. Thus you will be freed from the feverish vexations of this worldly life. ⁴⁶ Be rational, dispassionate and calm in your desire. Remain sober minded and free from ardent expectations. Rest satisfied with what you get of your own lot in order to be free from the feverish heat of worldliness. ⁴⁷ Be unimpassioned and unperturbed with earthly cares. If you will be free from the fever heat of this world, be pure and sinless, and neither be stingy nor extravagant. ⁴⁸ Be free from all anxiety, O Rama, by obtaining that good which the world cannot give, and which satisfies all our earthly wants. Have this super-mundane bliss, O Rama, and be as full as the ocean and free from the feverish cares of this world.

⁵⁴ Now Rama, rule over this unrivalled kingdom as directed by your sovereign father and manage well everything under your own inspection. This kingdom is filled with every blessing and the rulers are all loyal to their king. Therefore you must not omit doing what is your duty or be elated with your happy lot of royalty.

Chapter 6 — Doing One's Duty; Merit Accrues through Lifetimes

In my opinion, a man is liberated who does his works from a sense of his duty and without any desire of his own or sense of his own agency.

² Whoever having obtained a human form is engaged in acts out of his own choice and with a sense of his own agency, is subject to ascent and descent to heaven and hell by turns. ³ Some people who are inclined to undutiful acts by neglecting the performance of their destined duties are doomed to descend into deeper hells and to fall into greater fears and torments from their former states. ⁴ Some men who are tightly bound to the chain of their desires and have to feel the consequences of their acts are made to descend from their brutal life to the state of vegetables, or to rise from it to animal life again.

Chapter 7 — Two Ways to Attain Self Realization: Effort & Intuition

Rama, I have told you how mankind generally attains knowledge. Now I will tell you of another different method.

² Rama, we have two ways that are best calculated for the salvation of souls born in human bodies on earth. The one is through attainment of heavenly bliss and the other by their final blessing of bliss.

⁵ Hear now about the attainment of intuitive knowledge, which is like getting fruit fallen from the sky, from an old tale which I will now relate. ⁶ Hear the happy and holy story which removes the chains of our good and evil deeds, and which the last born men (now living) must taste with a zest for their enlightenment, as others taste a fruit fallen from heaven for their entertainment.

Chapter 8 — Janaka Hears the Songs of the Holy Masters (Siddhas)

There lives the mighty King of Videha, Janaka by name, who is blessed with all prosperity and unbounded understanding. ² He is like the ever fruitful wish-fulfilling tree to the host of his suitors, and like the vivifying sun to his lotus-like friends. He is like the genial spring to the small flowers of his relatives, and like Kama the god of love to females. ³ Like the changing moon, he gives delight to the twice born brahmins, as that luminary makes lilies bloom. Like the bright sun he destroys the darkness of his gloomy enemies. He is an ocean of gems of goodness to all and the support of his kingdom, like Vishnu the supporter of the world.

⁴ One spring evening Janaka happened to wander about a forest abounding in young vines with bunches of crimson blossoms on them, resonant with the melody of sweet sounding kokila nightingales warbling their tuneful choirs. ⁵ He walked among flowery pleasure gardens resembling graceful beauties with ornaments upon them, and sported in their covered shelter as the god Indra sports in his Nandana pleasure garden. ⁶ Leaving his attendants behind him, he stepped into a grove standing on the plain of a hill in the midst of that romantic forest, which was smelling with the fragrance of flowers borne all about by playful winds.

⁹ The masters sang, “We adore that Being which is neither the subjective nor objective, and which in our belief is the positive joy that rises in our souls and has no fluctuation in it.”

¹¹ Others chanted, “We adore that Being which is in the midst of all that is and what is not.”

¹² Some sang, “We adore that real Existence which is all, who owns all things, by whom all is made, from whom all has sprung, for whom they exist, in whom they exist, to whom do all returns, and into which they are all absorbed.”

¹³ Some sang, “We adore that Spirit which begins with the letter ‘a’ and ends in ‘h’ with the dot ‘m’ and which we continually inspire and respire in our breathings (aham hansah, “I am He.”).”

¹⁵ Others again declared, “By forsaking all other desires, one obtains this object of his wish. This being had, the poisonous plants of all other desires are entirely uprooted from the heart.”

Chapter 9 — Janaka's Reflections

Upon hearing these compositions of the spiritual masters, King Janaka was dejected in his mind, like a coward at the noise of a conflict. ² He returned towards home and traveled there in silence, like a stream gliding in its silent course under trees on the shore towards the bed of the distant ocean.

³ He left behind all his domestics in their respective rooms below, and ascended alone to the highest balcony, like the sun mounting the top of a mountain. ⁴ There he saw flights of birds randomly flying in different directions. He thought how men hurried about in the same manner and mourned their deplorable conditions.

Janaka thinking to himself:—

⁵ Ah how miserable that I have to move about in the pitiable state of the restless mob that rolls about like a rolling stone, pushed backward and forward by another. ⁶ I have a short span of endless duration allotted to my share of lifetime, yet I am a senseless fool to place my trust in the hope of its durability. ⁷ The duration of my royal rule is short also as it is limited to my lifetime. How can I be secure of its continuance, like a thoughtless man?

⁸ I have an immortal soul lasting from before and to continue even after my present existence. The present life is destructible, yet I am a fool to rely upon it like a boy believing a painted moon to be real. ⁹ Ah, what sorcerer has bewitched me by his magic wand to make me believe that I am not spell-bound at all! ¹⁰ What faith can I rely upon in this world which has nothing substantial or pleasant and nothing grand or real in it? Yet I do not know why the world deludes my mind.

¹¹ What is far from me appears to be near by my sensation of the same, and that which is nearest to me appears to be farthest away. Knowing this I must abandon outer objects in order to see the inner soul.

¹⁶ I am bound to earth without a rope. I am soiled without any outward dirt. I am fallen though sitting in this building. O my soul, how you are destroyed while living! ¹⁷ From where has this causeless ignorance overpowered my intelligent soul? From where has this shadow covered my soul's brightness like a dark cloud obscuring the sun? ¹⁸ Of what value are rich possessions and numerous relations to me when my soul is in despair, like children under the fear of ghosts and evil spirits? ¹⁹ How shall I place any reliance upon my sensual enjoyments which foreshadow death and disease? What dependence is there on my possessions which are filled only with anxieties and cares?

²⁰ It matters not whether these friends, the feeders on my fortune, may last or leave me at once. My prosperity is only a bubble and a false appearance before me. ²¹ Men of greatest opulence, many good and great men and our best friends and kindest relatives, have gone by and now live in only our memory. ²² Where are the riches of the earth's monarchs and where are Brahma's former creations? The past has given way to the present and these are to be followed by the future. Therefore there is no reliance upon anything. ²³ Many Indras have been swallowed up like bubbles in the ocean of eternity. Therefore expectation of longevity is ridiculous to the wise. ²⁴ Millions of Brahmas have passed away and their productions have disappeared under endless successions. Kings of earth have fled like their ashes, reduced to dust. Then what is the confidence in my life and stability?

²⁵ The world is only a dream by night. The body with its sense organs is only a misconception of the mind. If I place any credence in them, I am really to be blamed. ²⁶ My conception of myself and perception of other things are false imaginations of my mind. My egoism has laid hold of me, like a demon seizing an idiot. ²⁷ Fool that I am, seeing that I do not see how the span of my life is measured every moment by imperceptible instants of time, leaving only a small portion behind. ²⁸ I see the juggler of time seizing Brahmas, Vishnus and Shivas and making playthings of them on his playground of the world, flinging them all about like balls.

³¹ We meet with one hardship after another and buffet in waves of endless miseries in this earth. Yet we are so shameless that we do not feel disgusted with them. ³² We see all the desirable objects to which we attach our thoughts are frail and perishing, yet we do not seek the imperishable one and our everlasting good in the equanimity of the soul.

³³ Whatever we see as pleasant in the beginning, or in the middle, or in the end, and at all times are all unholy and subject to decay. ³⁴ Whatever objects are dear to the hearts of men are all found to be subject to the changes of their rise and fall. ³⁵ Ignorant people are everywhere inclined to evil acts. They grow day by day more hardened in their wicked practices. They repent every day for their sins, but never reprove themselves for the better. ³⁶ Senseless men, being devoid of sense in their boyhood and heated by their passions in youth, are never the better for anything. In their latter days they are oppressed with the care of their families. In the end they are overcome by sorrow and remorse.

⁴⁰ We have serpents creeping in the cells of our hearts and we have bodies filled with the brambles of diseases and dangers, and we do not know how to destroy them. ⁴¹ I see good mixed with evil and pain abiding with pleasure. There is sorrow seated on top of joy. I do not know where to go for help.

⁴² I see the earth full of common people constantly being born and dying in multitudes, but I find few honest and righteous men in it.

⁴⁵ You are constantly in search of what is more pleasant and lasting than others, but never seek after that highest prosperity which is beyond all your earthly cares. ⁴⁶ What is this great prosperity in which you take so much delight? It is only a mere vexation of your spirit which proves this vanity to be only your calamity. ⁴⁷ Again, what are these adversities which you fear so much? They may be the source of your true prosperity by setting you free from earthly disturbances and leading you to future joy.

⁴⁹ There is an unavoidable fate activating our worldly affairs and accidents. Therefore it is impudent to welcome some as good and to avoid others as evil. ⁵⁰ We are prone to things that are pleasant to sight, but they have a mortal flame in them that consumes us like poor moths in flames; bright to see but fatal to feel. ⁵¹ It is better to roll in the continuous flames of hellfire to which one is accustomed than to rise and fall repeatedly in the furnace of this world, like from the frying pan into the fire.

⁵² The wise say this world is a boundless ocean of grief. Then how can anybody who has fallen here expect any happiness here? ⁵³ Those who have fallen and not been altogether drowned in sorrow think their lesser sorrows are light and delight, like one condemned to be beheaded is glad to escape with a light punishment.

The world appears to have been created by accident, even as a coconut might appear to have fallen because a crow coincidentally happens to land on the tree that same moment.

⁵⁴ I have become the vilest of the vile and resemble a block of wood or stone. There is no difference between me and an ignorant clown who never has had a thought of eternal concern in his head. ⁵⁵ The great tree of the world, with its many branches, twigs and fruit, has sprung from the mind and is rooted in it. ⁵⁶ It is the conception of the world in my mind that causes its existence and presents its appearance before me.

Now I will try to efface this conception from my mind and forget this world altogether. ⁵⁷ I will no longer allow myself to be deluded like monkeys with the forms of things that I know are not real, only changing and fleeting ideas. ⁵⁸ I have woven and stretched out the web of my desires and gathered only sorrows and sorrows. I fell into and fled from the snare of my own making, and I am now resolved to take my rest in the soul. ⁵⁹ I have wailed and bitterly wept a great deal thinking of the depravity and loss of my soul. Henceforth I will cease to lament, thinking that I am not utterly lost.

⁶⁰ I am now awakened, and I am happy to learn who is robbing my soul. It is my own mind, and this I am determined to kill because it has for so long deprived me of the inestimable treasure of my soul.

⁶¹ For so long my mind was at large like a loose and unstrung pearl. Now will I pierce it with the needle of reason and string it with the virtues of self control and subjection to wisdom. ⁶² The cold icicle of my mind will melt from the solar heat of reason. My mind will be confined in the endless meditation of its Eternal Maker.

⁶³ I am now awakened to my spiritual knowledge, like these holy masters, saints and sages. I will now pursue my spiritual inquiries for the contentment of my soul. ⁶⁴ Having now found my long lost soul, I will continue to look upon its pure light with joy in my lonely retirement. I will remain quiet and still in contemplation of my soul, like a motionless cloud in autumn. ⁶⁵ Having cast away the false belief of my corporeality and that these possessions and properties are mine, and having subdued my mighty enemy the mind by my force, I will attain the tranquility of my soul with the help of my reason.

Chapter 10 — Silent and Solitary Reflections on Janaka

While Janaka was musing in this way, his chamberlain entered and came before him, like Aruna standing before the chariot of the sun.

² The chamberlain said, “O sire, your kingdom is safe under your protecting arms. Now rise to attend to the daily rites, as it becomes your majesty.”

¹⁰ Though asked in this way by the head chamberlain, yet the king remained in his meditative mood, thinking on the wonderful phenomena of nature.

¹¹ Janaka thought to himself:—

This royalty and these duties of mine are for a very short time. I do not require these things that are so transitory in their nature. ¹² I must leave these things that at best are only waters of a mirage. I must remain close to myself in my lonely seclusion, like a calm and solitary lake. ¹³ The pleasures of this world displayed around us are entirely useless to me. I will promptly leave them and remain in my happy retirement.

¹⁴ O my heart, to avoid the snares of disease and death, abandon your shrewdness in pursuing the objects of your desire. ¹⁵ Whatever state or condition of life the heart hankers for its delight, it is sure to meet with some difficulty, distress or disappointment coming out of the same. ¹⁶ Whether your heart is engaged or disengaged with the objects of sense, you will never find any object, either in act or thought, that is conducive to the true happiness of your soul. ¹⁷ Therefore forsake thoughts of the vile pleasure of your senses and concentrate on those thoughts that are filled with the true happiness of the soul.

Vasishta speaking:—

¹⁸ Thinking in this manner, Janaka remained in mute silence. His restless mind became as still and made him sit down like a picture in painting or like a statue. ¹⁹ The chamberlain uttered not a word more. He stood silent in mute respect and fear of his master, and from his knowledge of the dispositions of kings.

²⁰ Janaka, in his state of silent meditation, reflected again on the vanity of human life, with cool calmness of his mind, and thought.

Janaka thinking to himself:—

²¹ Now must I be diligent to find the best and most precious treasure in the world, and know what is that imperishable thing to which I must bind my soul as its surest anchor.

²² What is the good of doing or not doing my acts? Nothing is produced of anything which is not perishable in its nature. ²³ It matters not whether the body is active or inactive because all the body's actions end in utter inaction as all force is reduced to rest. It is the pure consciousness within me that always remains the same and it loses nothing from the loss of the body or from lack of physical action. ²⁴ I do not wish to have what I have not, or dare leave what I already have. I am content with myself. So let me have what is mine and what I have.

²⁵ I get no real good by my acts here, nor do I lose anything by refraining from them. What I get by my acts or lack of action is all zero and void of vanities, and nothing to my purpose or liking. ²⁶ Whether I am doing or not doing, and whether my acts are proper or improper, I have nothing to desire here, nor anything desirable that I have to expect from them. ²⁷ I have got what was due according to my past actions. This body is the result of my former acts. It may continue its motion and actions or it may become still and fade away. It is all the same to me.

²⁸ The mind being set at ease by lack of its action or passion, the actions of the body and its members are similarly at ease by not doing. ²⁹ The acts of men which happen to take place as the results of their destiny or previous actions, are reckoned as no acts of theirs. ³⁰ The impression which the inner soul bears of its past actions and passions give its color to the later nature and character of men's actions. Now that my soul has obtained its imperishable state of spirituality, I am free from the frequent changes of transmigrations of my body and mind.

Chapter 11 — Subjection of the Mind

Thinking this way, Janaka rose up to perform his daily rites as usual and without any sense of his agency. He did his duty in the way as the sun rises every day to bring the morning: without his consciousness of it. ² He discharged his duties as they presented themselves to him and without any concern or expectation of their rewards. He did them awake as if he were sleeping.

³ Having discharged his duties of the day and honored the gods and the priests, he passed the night absorbed in meditation. ⁴ His mind being set at ease and his wandering thoughts repressed from their objects, he pondered in his mind in the dead of night.

Janaka thought:—

⁵ O my mind that is wandering all about with the revolving world, know that your restlessness is not agreeable to the peace of my soul. Therefore rest quietly from your wanderings abroad. ⁶ It is your business to imagine many things at your pleasure because you think you have a world of thoughts present before you every moment. ⁷ You shoot forth in innumerable sorrows by the desire of endless enjoyments, like a tree shoots out into a hundred branches from being watered at the roots. ⁸ Our births and lives and worldly affairs are all productions of our yearning thoughts. Therefore I pray that you, O my mind, rest quietly by abandoning your earthly desires.

¹³ The world is an unreality like yourself. Therefore there can be no true relation between two unrealities. It is only a dispute over words to maintain the relation of two negatives to one another. ¹⁴ Even if we assume that you are a reality and the world is unreal, still there can be no agreement between you, as there is none between the living and the dead, or between positive and negative ideas. ¹⁵ Should both mind and world be realities and co-exist for ever, then there can be no reason for the joy or sorrow of the one at the gain or loss of the other.

¹⁸ O wicked mind, there is nothing here so good and great that you can attain your high perfection through it — except to forsake all mental fluctuations and depend with full resignation on the unchangeable One.

Chapter 12 — On the Greatness of Reasoning (Self Inquiry)

Janaka, having earnestly reasoned with his mind in this manner, then attended to the affairs of state without shrinking from them, yet mentally detached. ² He was not pleased by the happy tasks and tidings but was indifferent to them, his fixed attention serving as if he were in slumber and not the actor.

⁷ He became acquainted with the Soul that is inherent in all bodies. He saw all things abiding in the omnipotence of Consciousness and identical with the infinite. ⁸ He was never too joyful or exceedingly sad, but preserved his equanimity amidst the conflicts of his soul and sensible objects. ⁹ Since that time, the venerable Janaka became liberated in his living state and is renowned as a veteran sage among mankind.

¹⁰ He continues to rule the land of the Videha people without being subject to feelings of joy or sorrow, not even for a moment. ¹¹ Knowing the causes of good and evil, he is neither elated nor dejected at any favorable or unfavorable circumstance of his life, nor does he feel glad or sad at any good or bad accident relating the state. ¹² He completes his duties without setting his mind to them. His mind is wholly employed in his intellectual speculations. ¹³ Remaining thus in his trance state of sound sleep (abstraction, samadhi), his thoughts are quite withdrawn from all objects about him. ¹⁴ He is unmindful of the past and heedless about the future. He enjoys only the present moment with a happy heart and a cheerful mind.

¹⁵ Janaka obtained the obtainable and what is worthy to be obtained by his own reasoned analysis and not, O lotus-eyed Rama, by any other desire. ¹⁶ Therefore we should reason and reflect in our minds until we succeed and arrive at the conclusion of the subject. ¹⁷ The presence of the Holy Light is not to be had by a teacher's lectures or the teaching of scriptures. It is not the result of good acts or the company of holy men. It is the result of your own reasoning.

¹⁸ A good understanding assisted by the power of good perception leads to the knowledge of that highest state which acts of piety cannot do. ¹⁹ He who has the keen light of the lamp of his perception always before him is able to see both the past and future. No shadow of ignorance intercepts his vision. ²⁰ Through keen perception one is able to cross the sea of dangers, like a passenger using a boat to cross a river.

foreknowledge sees the result of his actions beforehand, but one without foresight is at a loss to judge imminent events.

Chapter 13 — Government of the Mind: Consciousness Is Real, Mind (Imagination and Will) Is Not

Now Rama, like King Janaka and without any difficulty or failing, reflect on the Supreme Spirit in your own spirit and know what the wise meditate upon.

² The wise men of the active-pure (rajasa-satvika) variety, like Janaka and other holy sages, obtain their desired objects by themselves. ³ As long as you continue to restrain your organs of sense from their objects, Divine Soul will grace your inner soul with its presence. ⁴ When the Lord God and Supreme Soul is gracious to you, you will see a halo of light cast over all things dispersing all grief from your sight. ⁵ The sight of the Supreme Spirit will remove the plentiful seeds of bias from your mind, and it will drive away the sorrowful sights of misery pouring upon your view in copious showers.

¹¹ Attaining this blessed knowledge of intuition which removes our ignorance is what they call getting fruit fallen from heaven.

²⁰ Again, fostering a fondness for something as good and a hatred for others as bad is only a disease of your mind that serves only to make you uneasy. ²¹ Do not be fond of what you think to be beautiful or be disgusted at what appears hateful to you. Get rid of these opposite feelings and be even minded by fixing it on the One before whom all things are alike and equally good.²² They who view the desirable and the detestable in the same light are neither fond of the one nor adverse to the other.²³ Until the fancy of the desirability of one thing and the dislike of the other is effaced from the mind, it is as hard to have the good grace of equanimity, just as it is difficult for moonlight to pierce a cloudy sky.

²⁴ The mind that considers one thing to be appropriate and another as inappropriate is deprived of the blessing of detachment, just as the sakota plant is despised because it has no flowers or fruit.

²⁵ Where there is a craving for the desirable and an aversion to what is unseemly, and when there is a cry for gain and an outcry at one's loss, it is impossible for even mindedness, dispassion or tranquility to abide in the mind.

²⁶ There being only the essence of one pure Brahman diffused throughout the universe, it is very improper to take the one as many, and among them something as good or bad.²⁷ Our desires and dislikes are the two apes living on the tree of our hearts. While they continue shaking and swinging that tree with their jogging and jolting, there can be no rest.

³⁰ The mind running to meanness is to be repressed by restraining passions and desires, just like the current of water is stopped by its valve.³¹ Shun the sight of external things. They are the roots of error and fallacy. Always consider their internal properties, both when you are awake and asleep, and also when you are walking about or sitting down.³² Greedy men are caught like greedy fish in the hidden net of desires that are incapable of being satisfied. That net is woven with the threads of worldly cares, and it is under the waters of worldly affairs.

³⁶ Having destroyed the former state of your mind by its present state, try to forget them both in future by your heedless mind and manage yourself unmindful of the world.³⁷ Your utter oblivion of the world will prevent the revival of your mind and stop the reappearance of ignorance which accompanies the mind.³⁸ Whether you are waking or sleeping or in any other state of your life, you must remember the nothingness of the world and give up your reliance on it.³⁹ Leave off your selfishness, O Rama, and rely upon the detachment of your soul.

Lay hold of what ever offers itself to you and without seeking for it.⁴⁰ As the Lord God does everything and yet is aloof from everything, so must you do all acts outwardly without you mixing in anything. ⁴¹ Knowing the knowable, one finds himself like the uncreated soul and a great lord of all. But being apart from that soul, he sees only the material world spread before him. ⁴² He who has the sight of the inner spirit is free from thoughts of the external world and is not subjected to joy or grief or sorrow or any other evil of his life.

⁴⁵ He is not plunged into any difficulty who receives what he gets and is employed with whatever offers of itself to him without considering the good or evil that he is to gain by it. ⁴⁶ He who is certain of the truth of the spiritual essence of the world, yearns not for its physical enjoyments but remains even-minded at all times.

⁵⁰ The mind, moved and lit by the heat and light of the lamp of consciousness, becomes extinct without its physical force and grows as motionless as a dead body. ⁵¹ The nature of consciousness is known to exclude the idea of motion or pulsation from it. The scriptures call the power that has vibration reasoning or the mind. ⁵² The breathing (or vibration) of the mind, like the hissing of a snake, is called its imagination, but by knowing consciousness as the self, the mind comes to the true knowledge of the inner soul. ⁵³ Consciousness free from thoughts is the ever lasting Brahman, but being joined with thought, it is called the imaginative principle or the mind. ⁵⁴ This power of imagination, having assumed a definite form, is called the mind. The mind with its will and its choices is situated in the heart of living beings.

⁵⁵ With its two distinct powers of imagination and will, the mind is employed in the acts of discriminating and choosing the agreeable from what is disagreeable to it. ⁵⁶ Consciousness, being seated in the heart with its thoughts and wills, forgets its spiritual nature and remains as a dull material substance. ⁵⁷ The intellect being thus confined in the hearts of all animals in this world, continues in utter oblivion of its nature until it is awakened of itself, either by its intuition or the instruction of teachers or otherwise.

⁵⁸ Intellect is awakened by instruction from the scriptures and teachers, by the practice of dispassion, and by subjugation of the organs of sense and action. ⁵⁹ When the minds of living beings are awakened by learning and self-control, they tend towards the knowledge of the great Brahman, or else they wander at random about the wide world. ⁶⁰ We must therefore awaken our minds that are dormant to divine knowledge, rolling in the pit of worldliness from intoxication of the wine of error. ⁶¹ As long as the mind is not awakened, it is unconscious of everything. Though it perceives what can be perceived, yet this perception is as false as the sight of a city in our fancy.⁶² But when the mind is awakened by divine knowledge to the sight of the Supreme Being, it presents everything in itself, just as the inner fragrance of flowers also pervades the outer petals.

⁶³ Though consciousness has the quality of knowing everything contained in all the three worlds, yet it has only little knowledge of them because of its insufficient desire to know them.⁶⁴ The mind without intellect is a dull block of stone, but it is opened by divine light, like the lotus bud opening under sunlight.⁶⁵ The mind that imagines is as devoid of understanding as a statue made of marble is unable to move about by itself.⁶⁶ How can regiments drawn in a painting wage a war? How can moonbeams make the medicinal plants emit their light?⁶⁷ Who has seen dead bodies smeared with blood running about on the ground? Who has witnessed stone fragments singing musical choruses in the woods?⁶⁸ Where does the stone idol of the sun dispel the darkness of the night? Where does an imaginary forest of the sky spread its shade on the ground?

⁷⁴ The mind, the living soul and understanding are all only fictitious names of an unreality according to the conceptions of false thinkers, and not of them who know the true spirit.⁷⁵ In reality there is no mind, no understanding, no thinking principle, and no body. There is only the reality of the one Universal Spirit which is ever existent everywhere.⁷⁶ The one Universal Spirit is the soul which is all this world. It is time and all its fluctuations. It is more transparent than the atmosphere, and it is clear because it is nothing at all.⁷⁷ It is not always apparent, owing to its transparency, yet it is ever existent because of our consciousness of it. The spirit is beyond all things and is perceived by our inner perception.

⁸⁴ The living body perceives in its heart the notion of a distant place that exists in the mind. This proves the identity of the vital breath and the thinking mind. ⁸⁵ Therefore, by repressing the mind the vital breath is also repressed, which produces longevity and health.

⁸⁶ Stone has the capability of mobility, and fuel of inflammability, but vital breath and mind do not have powers of vibration or thinking (without the force of the intellect and the spirit). ⁸⁷ The breath of life by itself is inert, and its pulsation is the effect and composed of the surrounding air. So the action of the mind is due to the force of consciousness whose transparency pervades all nature.

⁸⁸ The mind is the union of intellectual and vibrating powers. Its production is as false as the falsity of its knowledge. ⁸⁹ Mental power is called error and also illusion, and these in ignorance of the Supreme Brahman produce the knowledge of this poisonous world.

⁹⁵ How can this union of consciousness with only its vibration be called the mind with its multifarious functions? The commander alone, without the component parts of cavalry, elephants and others, cannot be called an army. ⁹⁶ Therefore there is no such thing as a good or bad mind in any of the three worlds. The bias of its existence will be utterly removed by full knowledge of spirituality.

⁹⁷ It is in vain and to no purpose that people imagine the existence of the mind. It is proved to be an unreality and has no substantiality of its own. ⁹⁸ Therefore, O magnanimous Rama, never give rise to false imaginations of any kind, and particularly that of the mind which never exists anywhere.

⁹⁹ False fantasies arise like a mirage from the lack of full knowledge of things. They spring in the heart, which is as barren as a desert, for want of the rain of full knowledge. ¹⁰⁰ The mind is a dead thing owing to its lack of form or action, and yet, as it is idolized in the circles of common people, it is a wonder. ¹⁰¹ It is a wonder that the mind, having no soul or essence, no body or size or support of its own, should spread its net over all ignorant minds.

Chapter 14 — Impossibility of Curing the World; the Parade of Prey; the Thinking Principle

Multitudes of men are carried away by the torrents and waves of the sea of worldly pursuits. They are deaf and dumb to the admonitions of their spiritual instructors. ² They are not fit to derive the benefit of the spiritual knowledge which I have propounded in this yoga scripture by my rational discourses. ³ They who are born blind and can see nothing are not to be shown a painting of a garden by an intelligent artist, portrayed with blooming blossoms and beautiful flowers. ⁴ There is no fool who would present fragrant odors to one whose nostrils are snorting under some nasal disease, and there is no dolt so great who would consult an ignorant man on spiritual matters.

⁸ Know there is no such a thing as a well governed mind. Though you may fling it away from you, yet it is never lost or annihilated. ⁹ The simpleton who does not control his false and delusive mind is tormented to death by its venomous smart, as if stung by a deadly reptile. ¹⁰ The learned understand the vital powers. They know the operations of the organs of action and they depend on the action and force of the soul. Say then, O Rama, what is that thing which they call the mind?

of prey swallow the snake and the weasel preys upon snakes. ²³ The weasel is killed by the cat, which is killed by the dog. The bear destroys the dog and is at last destroyed by the tiger. ²⁴ The lion overcomes the tiger, and is overcome on its turn by the sharabha. The sharabha is overthrown by its fall on rocky steeps in its attempt to jump over gathering clouds.

⁴² Now Rama, consider well the miseries of ungoverned minds and take yourself to the knowledge of the knowable one. ⁴³ Never entertain the vain hobgoblin of a mind in your imagination. The mind has no real existence of its own. Beware of this false belief, which may betray you like the imagined ghosts of children. ⁴⁴ As long as you are forgetful of the soul, you must remain in utter ignorance and remain tortured by the serpent residing in the recess of your heart.

⁴⁵ Now you know the whole truth, as I have explained it to you. It is only your imagination that presents you with the idea of your mind, and you must get rid of that idea forever. ⁴⁶ If you rely upon what can be perceived, you are subject to the delusion of your mind. No sooner do you shun your reliance on phenomena than you are liberated from your illusion of it.

⁴⁹ Rama, shun the false thoughts of your self-existence and those of the visible world. Forsake your belief in duality in order to settle yourself in infinite unity. ⁵⁰ Continue to meditate on the soul, as it is situated between the subjective viewer and the objective view of this world, and as it exists in your vision which lies between the two. ⁵¹ Forsake your ideas about the subjects and objects of your taste, and think about their intermediate state of taste as being one with the soul. ⁵² Rama, place yourself in the position of your power of thinking which lies between the thinker and what can be thought of. Support your soul on the support-less soul of all, and remain steady in your meditation.

⁵³ Forsake the cares of the world and be exempt from thoughts of existence and non-existence. Meditate on the Universal Soul and be settled with your soul in that Soul. ⁵⁴ When you have learned to think on the thinkable One by renouncing the thought of your own existence, then you shall arrive to that state of unconsciousness which is free from misery.

⁵⁵ Know your thoughts to be your chains and your self-consciousness to be your binding chain. Therefore, O Rama, loosen the lion of your soul from the prison house of your mind. ⁵⁶ By departing from the state of the Supreme Soul and falling into the thoughts of the mind, you will be crowded by your imaginations and you will see all about you only the objects of your thoughts.

⁵⁸ When you become conscious of the Supreme Soul in you and permeated throughout all nature, then you will find the thinker and his thinking, the thinkables and their thoughts, all vanish into nothing.

⁵⁹ The thought that “I have a soul and a living soul also” brings all the miseries to which we are exposed throughout all eternity. ⁶⁰ The consciousness that “I am the one soul and not a distinct living being” is called tranquility of the spirit and its true joy.

⁶¹ O Rama, when you are certain that the world is the Universal Soul itself, you will find the false distinctions of your mind and individual living soul to be nothing in reality. ⁶² When you perceive that all this is your very self, then your mind will melt away into the soul, as darkness dissolves in sunlight and shadows disappear in the air. ⁶³ As long as you cherish the snake of your mind within yourself, you are in danger of catching its poison. But when the mind is removed through your yoga meditation, you escape the danger immediately.

⁶⁴ Be bold, O Rama, and destroy the mighty demon of the deep rooted error of your mind by the power of the mantras of your perfect knowledge. ⁶⁵ Upon disappearance of the demon of the mind from the dwelling of your body, as when a demon yaksha disappears in the air, you will be free from every disease, danger, care and fear. ⁶⁶ Dispassion and detachment joined with the knowledge of unity melt down the substance of the mind and confer the best and highest state of joy and rest in the Supreme Spirit, bringing on that state of tranquility which is the main aim of everybody. May all these blessings attend upon you.

Chapter 15 — On Greed

The soul by following the unholy essence of the mind, which is the source of the world, is led to fall into the trap laid by the mind for all living beings. ² The soul then loses the brightness of its spiritual form and takes the gross shape of the senses. It waits upon the guidance of the mind and indulges in its impure imaginations. ³ It falls into greed which, like a poisonous plant, makes it senseless and spreads a fearful anesthesia over it. ⁴ Greed like a dark night hides the soul under the gloom of oblivion and produces endless pains to the soul.

²² Greed blows on men like the wind. Greed makes men sit still like stones. Greed makes some as calm as the earth, and greed ransacks the three worlds in its rapid course. ²³ This entire parade of men is impelled back and forth by greed, as if pulled by ropes. It is easy to break ropes, but not the bond of greed.

²⁴ Rama, get rid of greed by forsaking your desires. Because the wise have determined that the mind dies away from lack of its desires. ²⁵ Never observe the distinctions of “my”, “yours” and “his” in any of your wishes, but wish for the good of all alike. Never foster any bad desire. ²⁶ The thought of self in what is not the self is the parent of all our grief. When you cease to think the not-self as the self you are then reckoned among the wise.

²⁷ Cut off your egoism, O gentle Rama, and dwell in your unearthly self by forgetting yourself, and by dispelling your fear from all created beings.

Chapter 16 — Two Ways to Abandon Greed: Reason and Insight

¹ Rama said, “Sage, what you are saying, about me abandoning my egoism and greed, is too deep for me to understand. ² Sage, how is it possible to give up my ego without giving up this body and everything that is related to it? ³ Egoism is the chief support of the body, like a post supports a thatched house. ⁴ The body will surely perish without its egoism. Its durability will be cut short, like a tree is felled by sawing on its trunk. ⁵ Now tell me, O most eloquent sage, how can I live by giving up my egoism (which is myself)? Answer me according to your right judgment.

⁶ Vasishta replied:—

O lotus-eyed and respectful Rama, the wise, who are well acquainted with the subject, say there are two ways to abandon desires. One is called the knowable (based on knowledge or direct realization) and the other they call the thinkable (based on contemplation, reasoning).

⁷ There is a knowledge that I am the life of my body and its powers, and these are the supports of my life, and that I am something. ⁸ But weighing this internal conviction by the light of reason proves that I am not related to the external body and the body does not bear any relation to my internal soul. ⁹ Therefore, one performs one’s duties with calmness and coolness of understanding without any desire for results. This is called abandonment of desire through reasoning.

¹⁸ He who feels no joy or sorrow at the good or evil which befalls him in his lifetime, as it is the course of nature, is called the living liberated man. ¹⁹ He who neither desires nor dreads the casualties of good or evil that are incidental to human life, but remains quiet regardless of them as in his dead sleep, is known as the truly liberated man. ²⁰ He whose mind is free from thoughts of what is desirable or undesirable to him, and free from differentiation of “mine,” “yours” and “his” is called the truly liberated. ²¹ He whose mind is not subject to excess joy or grief, hope or fear, anger, boasting or miserliness, is said to have his liberation. ²² He whose feelings are all dulled within himself as in his sleep, and whose mind enjoys its joy like the beams of the full moon, is said to be a liberated man in this world.

²³ Valmiki says:—

After the sage had said so far, the day departed to its evening service with the setting sun. The assembled audience retired to their evening ceremonial washings, and with the rising sun on the next day, returned to the assembly.

Chapter 17 — Describing Liberation while Living and Brahman beyond Words

It is difficult, O Rama, to describe in words the inexplicable nature of the liberation of disembodied souls. But let me tell you more about the liberation of living beings.

² The desire of doing one's duties without expectation of reward is also called living liberation, and those who do their duties in this way are said to be the living liberated. ³ The wise sages describe dependence of beings on their desires and their strong attachment to external objects as their bondage and chains in this world. ⁴ But the desire to conduct oneself according to the course of events without any expectation of results also constitutes the liberation of the living as one's duties are performed with the body only. ⁵ The desire to enjoy external objects is truly the bondage of the soul. Indifference to worldly enjoyments constitutes one's freedom in his living state. ⁶ Lack of greed and anxiety in anticipation of some gain, and absence of joy and change in one's disposition afterwards make true freedom of men.

¹⁸ Of these four kinds of beliefs, the first leads to bondage and the other three, growing from purity of thought, lead to the path of liberation. ¹⁹ Among these, the first is subject to the bondage of greed, but the other three, proceeding from pure desire, are crowned with liberation. ²⁰ In my opinion, those of the third kind, who consider themselves one with the Universal Soul, are never subject to sorrow or pain. ²¹ The magnitude of the Supreme Spirit extends over and below and all about existence. Therefore the belief that "All in one" or "One in all" never holds a man in bondage.

²² The fourth kind, those who believe in emptiness and maintain the principles of nature or illusion, are in ignorance of the divine knowledge that represents God as Shiva, Lord, He, and eternal Soul. ²³ He is all and everlasting without a second or another like him. He is pervaded by his omniscience, and not by the ignorance called illusion (maya). ²⁴ The spirit of God fills the universe like the water of the ocean fills the deep. The spirit of God stretches from the highest heaven to the lowest abyss of the infernal regions. ²⁵ Therefore only His reality is ever existent. No unreal world exists at anytime. Liquid water fills the sea, and not the swelling wave that rises in it.

²⁸ Never be joyful or sorry for anything belonging to you or another. Do not feel delighted or dejected at any gain or loss that may happen to occur to you. ²⁹ Be of an even disposition, and rely on your essence as one with the Supreme Soul. Attend to your many duties. Be observant of unity in your spiritual concerns and dualities in your worldly affairs.

³⁰ Beware of falling into the hidden holes of this world in your pursuit of varieties of objects. Do not be like an elephant falling into a hidden pit in the forest. ³¹ O Rama of great soul, there cannot be a duality as it is thought in the mind. O Rama of enlightened soul, there cannot be any unity or duality of the soul. The true essence is ever existent without unity or duality. It is called the all and nothing particular, and as itself (swarupa). ³² There is no ego or your subjective-self, nor are there any objective worlds that you see. All this is the manifestation of the eternal and imperishable Omniscience. Know this world to be neither an entity nor non-entity by itself.

³³ Know the Supreme Being to be without beginning and end, the enlightener of all lights, the undecaying, unborn and incomprehensible one. He is without part and without any change in him. He is beyond imagination and beyond all the imaginary objects about us. ³⁴ Know for certain in your mind that the Lord is always present in the full light of your consciousness. He is the root of your consciousness. He is of the nature of your inner soul. He is conceivable in the intellect. He is the Brahman, the all and everlasting, the all-pervading, the subjective "I" and the objective "you" and this world.

Chapter 18 — Living Liberation or True Joy of Man; Everything Is Connected

Rama, I will now describe the nature of those great men who conduct themselves in this world with their desires under their control and whose minds are not blemished by evil inclinations.

² The sage whose mind is freed in his lifetime conducts himself unconcerned in this world. He smiles secure at its occurrences and is regardless of the first, last and middle stages of his life. ³ He is attentive to his present business and unmindful of every other object about him. He is devoid of cares and desires and his thought is only of his internal reflections. ⁴ He is free from anxiety in all places who tolerates whatever he happens to meet. He sees the light of reason in his soul and walks in the romantic gardens of his thoughts. ⁵ He who is neither elated nor depressed in any state of his life, who does not fall down under any circumstance, rests in transcendental bliss with prospects as bright as the cooling beams of the full moon.

¹⁷ Therefore Rama, keep your sight on the full view of your spirit by retracting it from external phenomena and internal thoughts. Conduct yourself in this world as one liberated in his lifetime.

²⁴ Behave yourself with mankind with a pretended appearance of joy and grief, and of condolence and congratulation with others, and an assumed shape of activity and action among mankind. ²⁵ Manage yourself, O Rama, with full possession of your mind, unaffected by pride or vanity, as if it were as clear as the spotless sky. ²⁶ Go through your life unshackled by the bonds of desire. Join in all the outward acts of life with an unaltered evenness of mind under every circumstance.

³¹ You have known the true essence of your being by your right discernment. Thereby you are free from the sense of your personality and are set free as the subtle air. ³² You have known the truth and must give up your knowledge of untruth, together with the thoughts of your friends and relatives, all which are unreal in their natures. ³³ Such being the case, you must consider your soul as something other than those, and that you have received your soul from the supreme source of all. ³⁴ This soul bears no relation to your friends or possession, to your good or evil actions, or to anything whatsoever in this world. ³⁵ When you are convinced that this very soul constitutes your essence, you have nothing to fear from the false appearance of the world which is no more than a misconception.

³⁶ You can have no concern for the well-being or grief of a friend or foe who is not born so to you. For every one being born for himself, you have no cause for joy or grief for anybody. ³⁷ If you know that you had been before (creation) and that you shall be so forever afterwards (to eternity), you are truly wise. ³⁸ If you are troubled so much with concern for friends in this life, then why not mourn those who are dead and gone in your present and past lives? ³⁹ If you were something other than what you are now, and if you have to be something different in the future, why then should you sorrow for what does not have its self-identity?

⁴⁰ If you are to be born no more, after your past and present births, then you have no cause for sorrow, being extinct yourself in the Supreme Spirit. ⁴¹ Therefore there is no cause for sorrow in anything that occurs according to the course of nature. Instead be joyful pursuing the duties of your present life.

⁴⁹ Everything is frail and unsteady and has its rise and fall from and into the Supreme Spirit. It is like the wave of the sea, rising and falling from and into the same water. ⁵⁰ Worlds are rolling upward and going down again, like the axis and spokes of a wheel. ⁵¹ The celestials sometimes fall into hell, and the denizens of hell are sometimes raised to heaven. Animals of one kind are regenerated in another form, and the people of one continent and island are reborn on another. ⁵² The wealthy are reduced to poverty, and the poor are raised to wealth. All beings are seen to be rising and falling in a hundred ways.

⁵⁵ The thought of something as one's own or another's, and of this and that as mine, yours, his or someone else's, are as false as the appearance of double suns and moons in the sky. ⁵⁶ That this is a friend and this other a foe, and that this is myself and that one is another, are all only false ego conceptions of your mind and must be wiped away.

⁵⁷ However, make it your pleasure to mix with the blinded populace and those who are lost to reason. Deal with them in your usual unaltered way. ⁵⁸ In your journey through this world, conduct yourself in such a manner that you do not sink under the burden of your cares of it. ⁵⁹ When you come to your reason, lay down your earthly cares and desires. Then shall you have that composure of mind that will exonerate you from all your duties and dealings in life.

⁶⁰ It is the part of low-minded men to reckon one as a friend and another as no friend. Noble minded men do not observe such distinctions between man and man. ⁶¹ There is nothing where I am not and nothing which is not mine. ⁶² The intellects of the wise are as clear as the spacious sky. There is no rising or setting of their intellectual light which views everything as serenely as in the serenity of the atmosphere and as plainly as the plain surface of the earth.

⁶³ Know Rama that all created beings are friendly and useful to you, and there is no person or thing in the world with which you are not related in some way. ⁶⁴ It is false to look anyone as a friend or foe among the various orders of created beings in the universe. In reality, each may be of help to you, however unfriendly they may appear at first.

Chapter 19 — On Family Relationships: the Story of Punya and Pavana

I will now give you an example on the subject, the story of two brothers born of a sage on the banks of Ganges where it flows in three directions. ² I have been talking about friends and enemies, so this wonderful tale from the past occurs to my mind. Hear this holy story.

⁹ There, on a tableland upon the craggy top of the mountain, flowed the sacred stream of the heavenly Ganges for the ablution and drink of the hermits. ¹⁰ There, on the banks of the triple path river Ganges, was a shining mountain, sparkling like bright gold and decorated with blossoming trees.

¹¹ There lived a sage named Dirghatapa who was a personification of meditation and a man of enlightened understanding. He had a noble mind and was accustomed to the austerities of tapas.

¹² This sage was blessed with two children as beautiful as the full moon. They were named Punya (Meritorious) and Pavana (Holy) and they were as intelligent as the sons of Brihaspati who are known as the two Kachas. ¹³ Dirghatapa lived with his wife and their two sons on the bank of the river amid a grove of fruit trees.

²⁰ The sage's wife, finding his lifeless body lying on the ground, fell down upon it and remained motionless like a lotus flower plucked from its stalk. ²¹ She also was long accustomed to the practice of yoga, according to her husband's instruction, so she also left her un-decayed body, like a bee flits from an un-faded flower into empty air. ²² Unseen by men, her soul followed her husband's as the light of the stars disappears in the sky at the dawn of the day.

²³ Seeing the death of both parents, the elder son Punya was busily employed in performing their funeral services, but the younger Pavana was deeply absorbed in grief at their loss. ²⁴ Being overwhelmed by the sorrow in his mind, he wandered about in the woods. Not having the firmness of his elder brother, he continued to wail in his mourning. ²⁵ The magnanimous Punya performed the funeral ceremonies of his parents, then went in search of his brother mourning in the woods.

²⁶ Punya said:—

My boy, why is your soul overcast by the cloud of your grief? Why do you shed tears from your lotus-eyes as profusely as rain showers, only to render you blind? ²⁷ Know, my intelligent boy, that both your father and mother have gone to their ultimate blissful state in the Supreme Spirit, called the state of salvation or liberation. ²⁸ That is the last resort of all living beings and that is the blessed state of all self subdued souls. Then why mourn for them who have returned and are reunited with their own proper nature?

²⁹ You vainly indulge yourself in false and fruitless grief. You are mourning for what is not to be mourned at all. ³⁰ Neither is she your mother nor he your father. You are not the only son of them who have had numerous children in their repeated births. ³¹ You also have had thousands of fathers and mothers in your bygone births, in as much as there are many streams of running waters in every forest. ³² You are not the only son of them who have had innumerable sons before you. Generations of men have passed away like the currents of a running stream. ³³ Our parents also had numberless children in their past lives, and the branches of human generation are as numerous as the innumerable flowers and fruit on trees. ³⁴ The numbers of our friends and relatives in our repeated lives in this world have been as great as the innumerable flowers and fruit of a large tree in all its many seasons. ³⁵ If we are to lament over the loss of our parents and children who are dead and gone, then why not also lament those we have lost and left behind in all our past lives?

³⁶ It is all only a delusion, O my fortunate boy, that is presented before us in this illusive world. In truth, O my conscious child, we have nobody who we may call to be our real friends or positive enemies in this world. ³⁷ In a true sense, there is no loss of anybody or anything in the world. It is only that they appear to exist and disappear, like the appearance of water in the dry desert.

³⁸ The royal dignity that you may see, adorned with a stately umbrella and flapping fans, is only a dream that lasts a few days. ³⁹ Consider these phenomena in their true light and, my boy, you will find that none of these nor ourselves nor anyone of us is to last forever. Therefore shun your error of the passing world from your mind forever.

⁴⁰ That these are dead and gone and these others exist before us are only errors of our minds and creatures of our false notions and fond desires. There is no reality in them. ⁴¹ Our notions and desires paint and present these various changes before our sight, like sunshine presenting water in a mirage. So our fancies, working in the field of our ignorance, produce the false conceptions that roll on like currents in the eventful ocean of the world, bringing the waves of favorable and unfavorable events to

Who is our father and who our mother? Who are our friends and relatives, except our notion of them as such? Friends and relatives are like dust raised by the gusts of our airy fancy. ² The conceptions of friends and enemies and our sons and relatives are the products of our affection and hatred of them. These being the effects of our ignorance are soon made to disappear into airy nothing upon enlightenment of understanding.

³ The thought of one as a friend makes him a friend. Thinking one as an enemy makes him an enemy. The knowledge of a thing as honey and of another as poison is owing to our opinions of them. ⁴ There being only one Universal Soul equally pervading the whole, there can be no reason to conceive of one as a friend and another as an enemy.

⁵ My boy, of what you are? What makes your identity when your body is only a composition of bones, ribs, flesh and blood, and not yourself? ⁶ Being viewed in its true light, there is nothing as “myself” or “yourself.” A fallacy of our understanding makes me think of me as Punya and you as Pavana. ⁷ Who is your father and who is the son? Who is your mother and who your friend? One Supreme Self pervades all infinity. Who do you call the self and who the not self?

⁸ If you are a spiritual substance and have undergone many births, then you have had many friends and properties in your past lives. Why do you not think of them also? ⁹ You had many friends in flowery fields where you pastured in your former form of a stag. Why do you not think of those deer who were once your dear companions? ¹⁰ Why do you not lament for your lost swan companions in the pleasant pool of lotuses where you did dive and swim about in the form of a gander? ¹¹ Why not lament your fellow trees in the forest where you once stood as a stately tree? ¹² You had lion comrades on the rugged mountain crags. Why do you not lament them also? ¹³ You had many mates among the fish in clear lakes decked with lotuses. Why not lament your separation from them?

¹⁴ You were a monkey in the grey and green woods of the country of Dasarna. You were a prince in land of frost and a raven in the woods of Pundra. ¹⁵ You were an elephant in the land of Haihayas and an ass in that of Trigarta. You became a dog in the country of Salya and a bird in the woods of sarala trees. ¹⁶ You have been a pipal tree in the Vindhyan Mountains and a wood insect in a large oak tree. You were a cock on Mandara Mountain, then born as a brahmin in one of its caves. ¹⁷ You were a brahmin in Kosala and a partridge in Bengal. You were a horse in the snowy land and a beast in the sacred ground of Brahma at Pushkara. ¹⁸ You were an insect in the trunk of a palm tree, a gnat in a big tree, and a crane in the woods of Vindhya. Now you are my younger brother.

¹⁹ You have been an ant for six months and lain within the thin bark of a bhugpetera tree in a glen of the Himalayan hills. Now you are born as my younger brother. ²⁰ You have been a centipede in a dunghill at a distant village where you lived for a year and half. Now you have become my younger brother. ²¹ Once you were the child of a Pulinda tribal woman and you lived on her breasts like the honey sucking bee on the core of a lotus. That same person is now my younger brother. ²² In this manner, my boy, you were born in many other shapes and had to wander all about Asia for numberless of years. And now are you my younger brother.

²³ Thus I see the past states of your existence caused by the prior desires of your soul. I see all this by my clear discernment and all-viewing sight. ²⁴ I also remember several births that I had to undergo in my state of ignorance, which I see clearly before my enlightened sight.

²⁵ I was a parrot in the land of Trigarta and a frog at the beach of a river. I became a small bird in a forest and was then born in these woods. ²⁶ Having been a Pulinda hunter in Vindhya, then a tree in Bengal, and afterwards a camel in the Vindhya range. I am at last born in this forest. ²⁷ I, who have been a chataka cuckoo in the Himalayas and a prince in Paundra province, then a mighty tiger in the forests of Sahya Hill, am now become your elder brother. ²⁸ He who had been a vulture for ten years, a shark for five months, and a lion for a full century is now your elder brother in this place. ²⁹ I was a chakora wood in the village of Andhara, a ruler in the snowy regions, then a proud son of a priest named Sailacharya in a hilly region.

³⁰ I remember the various customs and pursuits of different peoples on earth that I had to observe and follow in my repeated reincarnations among them. ³¹ In those different lives, I had many fathers and mothers and many more brothers and sisters, and also friends and relatives numbering hundreds and thousands. ³² For whom shall I lament and which shall I forget among this number? Shall I wail only for those I lose in this life? But these also are to be buried in oblivion like the rest, and such is the course of the world. ³³ Numberless fathers have gone by, and unnumbered mothers also have passed away and died. Innumerable generations of men have perished and disappeared, like withered leaves falling off.

³⁴ There are no bounds, my boy, to our pleasures and pains in this terrestrial world. Lay them all aside and let us remain unmindful of all existence. ³⁵ Forsake your thoughts of false appearances, relinquish your firm conviction of your own ego, and look to that ultimate course which has led the learned to their final blessing. ³⁶ For what is this commotion of people except a struggle to rise and fall? Therefore strive for neither, but live regardless of both like an indifferent sage. ³⁷ Live free from your cares of existence and nonexistence. Then you shall be free from your fears of decay and death. Remember calmly your self alone. Do not be like the ignorant. Do not allow anything or any accident to move you from your self possession.

³⁸ Know that you have no birth nor death, no fortune or sorrow of any kind, no father or mother, and no friend or foe anywhere. You are only your pure spirit. You have nothing of an unspiritual nature.

⁴³ Now my boy, rub out all your wishes and visible signs of memories from your mind and see the image of the serene spirit of God in your innermost soul. Learn to live like the great sages, with the sight of your spiritual light and by effacing all false impressions from your mind.

Chapter 21 — Suppression of Desires by Suppression of Thoughts

Pavana, having been lectured by Punya in this manner, became as enlightened in his intellect as the landscape at daybreak. ² After, they continued living in that forest with the perfection of their spiritual knowledge. They wandered about in the woods to their hearts content. ³ After a long time, they both attained nirvana and rested in their disembodied state of nirvana, like a lamp without oil wasting away of itself.

⁴ Thus is the end of men's great boasts of having large crowds of followers and numberless friends in their embodied states of lifetime. Alas, they carry nothing with them to their afterlife, nor do they leave anything behind which they can properly call theirs.

⁷ Now rise, O Rama, and remain aloft as in your aerial car by losing your worldly desires. Look from above with pity upon the miseries of groveling mortals. ⁸ This is the divine state known as the position of Brahma, which looks from above with unconcerned serenity upon all. By gaining this state, the ignorant are also freed from misery.

¹² There is no greater good to be derived by any means than by the greatness of mind. It gives security which no wealth or earthly treasure can confer on men. ¹³ It is only men of weak and crazy minds who are made to swing to and fro, rising and sinking in the tempestuous ocean of the world. ¹⁴ The mind filled with knowledge and full with the light of truth finds the world filled with ambrosial water, and moves over it as easily as a man walking on dry shoes, or on a ground covered with leather.

¹⁹ The coolness in the mind of a man who is not greedy is not found in the watery luminary of the moon, or in the icy caverns of the snow-capped Himalayas. Neither the coldness of plantain juice nor sandalwood paste is comparable with the cool headedness of one without desire. ²⁰ The mind that does not desire shines more brightly than the full moon and more brilliantly than the bright face of Lakshmi, the goddess of prosperity.

²¹ The urchin of appetite darkens the mind like a cloud obscures the moon, and like black ink obliterates a fair picture. ²² The tree of desire stretches its branches far and wide on every side, darkening the mind with their gloomy shadows. ²³ When the branching tree of desire is cut down at its roots, the plant of patience which was stunted under it shoots forth in a hundred branches. ²⁴ When the unfading tree of patience takes the place of the uprooted desires, it produces the tree of paradise that yields the fruit of immortality.

²⁵ O well-intentioned Rama, if you do not allow the sprouts of mental desires to germinate in your bosom, then you have nothing to fear in this world. ²⁶ When you become sober-minded after moderating your heart's desires, you will have the plant of liberation growing in its full luxuriance in your heart. ²⁷ When the grasping owl of desire nestles in your mind, it is sure you will be invaded by every evil which the foreboding bird brings on its home.

²⁸ Thinking is the power of the mind and thoughts dwell upon the objects of desire. Therefore abandon your thoughts and their objects and be happy with your thoughtlessness of everything. ²⁹ Anything that depends on any faculty is lost upon inaction of that faculty. Therefore by suppression of your thoughts you can put down your desires and thereby have rest and peace of mind.

Chapter 22 — The Story of Mahabali, the Benevolent King of Demons, and His Father Virochana

O Rama who is the bright moon of Raghu's race, you should also follow the example of Bali in acquiring wisdom by self-discernment.

² Rama said, "Venerable sage who is acquainted with all natures, it is by your favor that I have gained all that is worth gaining in my heart, and that is our final rest in the purest state of infinite bliss. ³ O sage, it is by your favor that my mind is freed from the great delusion of my many desires, just as the autumn sky is cleared of the rainy season clouds. ⁴ My soul is at rest and as cold as a stone. It is filled with the ambrosial nectar of divine knowledge and its holy light. I find myself resting in perfect bliss and as illumined as the queen of the stars rising in her full light in the evening.

⁵ O you dispeller of my doubts who resembles the clear autumn sky that clears the clouds of the rainy season, I am never full or satisfied with all your holy teachings. ⁶ For the advancement of my knowledge, tell me how Bali came to know transcendental truth. Explain it fully unto me, as holy saints reserve nothing from their humble students.

O Rama, pay attention to the interesting story of Bali. Your attention to it will give you knowledge of the endless, everlasting and unvarying truth.

¹⁷ Bali, the son of Virochana, ruled in this place as the king of demons. He supported the burden of his kingdom on the pillars of the demons' mighty arms. ¹⁸ He forced the gods, the supernatural vidyadharas, the serpents, and even the king of the gods to serve at his feet like his vassal retinue, and they were glad to serve him as their lord. ¹⁹ He was protected by Vishnu who contains the shining worlds in the treasure of his belly (brahmada), and who is the preserver of all embodied beings, and the support of the sovereigns of the earth.

⁶ At last, the king of the demons felt a distaste for all the enjoyments of life that he had tasted to excess. He also felt an uneasiness amidst the variety of his pleasures. ²⁷ He retired to the farthest polar mount of Meru. There, sitting on a ledge of one of its shining heights, he reflected on the state of this world and the vanity of mortal life.

Bali thinking to himself:—

²⁸ How much longer shall I have to rule over this world with my untiring labor? How much more must I remain to roam about the triple world in my successive reincarnations? ²⁹ Of what use is it to me to have this unrivaled sovereignty, which is a wonder in the three worlds. Of what good is it for me to enjoy this abundant luxury, so charming to the senses? ³⁰ Of what permanent delight are all these pleasures to me? They are pleasant only for the present short time and within a moment they are sure to lose all their taste and my zest for them.

³¹ There is the same rotation of days and nights in unvarying succession, and the same acts repeated day after day. To continue in the same unvaried course of life for a great length of time is rather shameful and in no way pleasant to anyone. ³² The same embraces of our beloved and eating the same food day by day are amusements fit only for playful children. They are disgraceful and disgusting to great minds.

³³ What man of taste will not be disgusted to taste the same sweets that he has tasted over and over again and which have become vapid and tasteless today? What sensible man can continue in the same course without feelings of shame and remorse? ³⁴ The revolving days and nights bring the same revolution of duties. I imagine this constant repetition of the same acts is as ridiculous to the wise as chewing ground meat. ³⁵ The actions of men are like those of waves that rise to fall, then rise again to subside in the waters. ³⁶ Repetition of the same act is the occupation of mad men. A wise man would be laughed at if he kept repeating the same sound, like children conjugating a verb in all its moods, tenses and inflexions.

³⁷ What action is there that once completed does not reoccur, but crowns its actor with his full success all at once? ³⁸ Or if this bustle of the world were for a short duration only, yet what is the good that we can derive from engaging in this commotion?³⁹ The course of actions is as interminable as the ceaseless repetition of boyish sports. It is hollow harping on the same string. The more the string is played, the more it reverberates its hollow sound.

⁴⁰ I see no such gain from any of our actions. I see nothing that being once gained may prevent our further efforts. ⁴¹ What can our actions bring beside the objects of sense gratification? They cannot bring about anything that is imperishable.

Vasishta speaking:—

Saying so, Bali fell into a trance (samadhi) of his profound meditation. ⁴² Then, coming to himself, he thought, “Ah! I remember now what I had heard from my father.” So thinking he stretched his eyebrows and gave expression to what he thought in his mind.

Bali thinking to himself:—

⁴³ I had asked my father Virochana, who was versed in spiritual knowledge and acquainted with the manners of the people of former and later ages, ⁴⁴ “What is that ultimate state of being where all our pains and pleasures cease to exist, and after its attainment we have no more to wander about the world or pass through repeated reincarnations? ⁴⁵ What is that final state towards which all our endeavors are directed, where our minds are freed from their error, and where, after all our wanderings and reincarnations, we obtain our full rest? ⁴⁶ What is that best of gains which gives full satisfaction to the cravings of the soul? What is that glorious object whose sight transcends all other objects of vision?”

⁴⁷ “All those various luxuries and superfluities of the world are in no way conducive to our real happiness because they mislead the mind to error and corrupt the souls of even the wisest of men.

⁴⁸ Therefore, O father, show me that state of imperishable joy whereby I may attain everlasting repose and tranquility.”

Chapter 23 — Virochana's Story about the Ruler's (Soul's) Undefeatable Minister (the Mind)

My son, somewhere in this universe there is an extensive country with a spacious sky whose ample space is able to hold thousands of worlds and many more spheres in it. ² It is without the wide oceans and seas and high mountains that are here on this earth. It has no forest, river or lake or any holy pilgrimage place as you see here below. ³ There is no land or sky. There is no heavenly body in its sky, nor are there these suns and moons, or the rulers of the spheres, or their inhabitants of gods and demons. ⁴ There are no races of yakshas and rakshas, or those tribes of plants and trees, woods or grass, or the moving and immovable beings as you see upon the earth. ⁵ There is no water, no land, no fire and no air. There are no sides of the compass, nor regions you call above and below. There is no light or shadow, nor are there any peoples, or the gods Vishnu, Indra and Shiva, nor any of the lesser gods or demigods there.

⁶ There is a great sovereign of that place who is full of indefinable light. He is the creator of all and pervades all, and is all in all, but quite quiescent in all places and things. ⁷ He elected a minister who was clever in administration, brought about what was impossible to be done, and prevented all mishaps from coming to pass. ⁸ The minister neither ate nor drank, nor did he know anything besides minding and doing his master's commands. In all other respects he was as inactive as a block of stone. ⁹ He conducted every business for his master who remained quite retired from all business, enjoying his rest and ease in his seclusion and leaving all his concerns to be managed by his minister.

¹⁰ Bali said, "Tell me sage, what place is that which is devoid of all population and free from all disease and difficulty? Who knows that place and how can anyone reach it? ¹¹ Who is that ruler of sovereign power and who is that minister of so great might? Who, being quite apart from the world, is inseparably connected with it and is invincible by our almighty demonic power? ¹² Tell me, O terror of the gods, this marvelous story of the great might of that minister in order to remove the cloud of doubt from my mind. Why he is unconquerable by us?"

¹³ Virochana replied:—

Know my son, this mighty minister cannot be overcome even by a gigantic force of asura giants, even if they were aided by millions of demons fighting on their side. ¹⁴ He is invincible, my son, by the god of a thousand eyes (Indra), and also by the gods of riches (Kubera) and death (Yama) who conquer all. Neither immortals nor giants can ever overpower him by their might.

¹⁵ All weapons are defeated in their attempt to hurt him. Swords, mallets, spears, bolts, discs and cudgels hurled against him are broken to pieces as if striking against solid rock. ¹⁶ He is unapproachable by missiles, invulnerable to arms and weapons, and cannot be taken by the dexterity of warriors. It is by his resistless might that he has brought gods and demigods under his subjection.

¹⁷ It was he who defeated our forefathers, the mighty Hiranyakashipu and Hiranyaksha, before they were destroyed by the great Vishnu who felled the giant asuras like a storm breaks down sturdy and rock-like oaks. ¹⁸ The gods Narayana and others (who had been the instructors of men) were all defeated by him and confined in their cells in the wombs of their mothers (by a curse of sage Bhrigu who denounced them to become incarnate in human forms). ¹⁹ It is by his favor that Kama, the god with his flower bow and five arrows, has been enabled to subdue and overcome the three worlds and boasts of being their sole emperor. ²⁰ The gods and demigods, the intelligent and the foolish, the deformed and the irascible are all moved by his influence. ²¹ The repeated wars between the gods and demons are the sports of this minister.

²⁴ You are said to be valiant if you can conquer this greatest of the giants in the three worlds who has been worrying all people out of their breath. ²⁵ After the rising of consciousness, the world appears as a flower-garden, like a lake of blooming lotuses at sunrise. The setting of consciousness covers the world in darkness like at sunset. ²⁶ It is only by the aid of your intellect and by removal of your ignorance that you can subdue this minister and be famed for your wisdom.

²⁷ By subduing this minister, you become the conqueror of the world, though you are no victor of it. By not subjugating this minister, you can have no subjection over the world, though you may be the master of it. ²⁸ Therefore to effect your perfect consummation and to secure your everlasting happiness, be diligent to overcome this minister by your best and most ardent exertions.

²⁹ It is easy for he who has been able to subdue this minister by his superior might to overcome the triple world and keep all its beings of gods and demons, the bodies of naagas and men, the races of yakshas and rakshas, and the tribes of serpents and kinnaras.

Chapter 24 — Virochana on Mind Control: Hiring Teachers and Practicing Reason & Detachment; and Realization

² Virochana replied:—

Though that minister is invincible and stands above all in his great might, yet I will tell you way in which he may be overcome by you or anyone else.

³ Son, if you employ the proper means, it is easy to bring him under subjection. Otherwise, he will have the upper hand over you like a snake’s poison that is not timely repelled by efficacious mantras and incantations. ⁴ The ministerial mind, if it is brought up like a boy in the right way, leads a man to the presence of the sovereign soul, like royal service advancing the civil servant before his king. ⁵ The appearance of the master makes the minister disappear from sight, just as the disappearance of the minister brings one to the full view of his king. ⁶ As long as one does not approach the presence of his king, he cannot fail to serve the minister, and as long as he is employed in service of the minister, he cannot come in sight of his king. ⁷ The king being kept out of sight, the minister is seen to exercise his might, but the minister kept out of view, the king alone appears in full view.

¹² Now my son, hear me explain what that place is which I called a country. It is the seat of liberation and where there is an end of all our pains. ¹³ The king of that place is the soul of divine essence which transcends all other substances. It is the soul that appoints the mind as its wise minister.

¹⁶ Bali asked, “Sage, how are we to quell the mind? Tell me plainly so that I may use that method to conquer this invincible barrier to bliss.”

¹⁷ Virochana answered:—

The means for subduing the mind are the lack of reliance or confidence in all external and sensible things, and the absence of all desire for temporal possessions.

¹⁸ This is the best method to remove the great delusion of this world and to subdue the big elephant of the mind. ¹⁹ This method is both very easy and practicable on one hand, as it is arduous and impracticable on the other. A constant habit of thinking so makes it easy, but lacking the habit renders it difficult.

²⁵ There is no good to be derived on earth without the exertion of one's courage. Man must give up his pleasure and the vexation of his spirit in order to reap the fruit of his actions. ²⁶ People speak of destiny as if it were a power, yet destiny has no shape or form. It means whatever comes to pass, and it is also called our lot or fate. ²⁷ The word destiny is also used by men to describe an accident over which they have no control and to which they submit with passive obedience. ²⁸ They use the word destiny to repress our joy and grief. But destiny, however fixed as fate, is overcome and set aside by means of courageous efforts.

²⁹ As the delusion of a mirage is dispelled by the light of its true nature, so courageous effort upsets destiny by effecting whatever it wishes to bring about. ³⁰ If we want to know what causes the good or bad results of our actions, we must learn that they turn as the mind wishes to mold them to being. ³¹ Whatever the mind desires and decrees, the same becomes destiny. There is nothing destined in the ordinary sense of the word. ³² It is the mind that does all this. The mind is the employer of destiny. The mind destines the destined acts of destiny.

³⁵ After the mind is set at rest, there remains the principle of the living soul (jiva). This is called the embodied spirit (purusha) which is the source of the energies of the body and mind. ³⁶ Whatever the living soul intends to do by means of its spiritual force, the same comes to take place and nothing else. ³⁷ Reliance on this spiritual power will uproot your dependence on bodily food.

There is no hope for spiritual happiness until there is a distaste towards temporal enjoyments. ³⁸ It is hard to attain the dignity of the all conquering self-sufficiency as long as one has the dastardly spirit of his earthly cravings. ³⁹ As long as one is swinging in the cradle of worldly affairs, it is hard to find rest in the covered shelter of peaceful tranquility. ⁴⁰ It is hard to get rid of your serpentine desires without continued practice of detachment and unconcern with worldly affairs.

⁴¹ Bali replied, "Tell me, O lord of demons, how does indifference to worldly enjoyments take deep root in the human heart and produce the fruit of longevity of the embodied spirit on earth?"

⁴² Virochana replied:—

The sight of the inner spirit produces indifference to worldly things, just as the growth of vines produces grapes in autumn. ⁴³ The sight of the inner spirit produces our internal unconcern with the world, just as the glance of the rising sun infuses its brightness in the cup of the lotus. ⁴⁴ Therefore sharpen your intellect with the whetstone of right reasoning. See the Supreme Spirit by withdrawing your mind from worldly enjoyments.

⁶² As the increasing gloom of rain clouds is followed by the serenity of autumn skies, so clear reasoning comes after detestation of enjoyments that flee with the advance of reason.⁶³ As seas and the clouds of heaven help one another by lending each other their waters, so right reasoning and apathy to pleasures tend to produce each other by turns.⁶⁴ Disbelief in destiny and courageous efforts follow each another, as helping one another follows friendship.

⁶⁵ You must grit your teeth to create a distaste even for those things you acquired legally according to the customs of your country. ⁶⁶ First you must acquire your wealth through courageous effort, then get good and clever men in your company by means of your wealth. ⁶⁷ Association with the wise, by exciting the reasoning power, produces an aversion to the sensual enjoyments of life which in turn produces an increase of knowledge and learning. ⁶⁸ These lead gradually to the utter renunciation of worldly objects. ⁶⁹ Then, by means of your reasoning, you attain that supreme state of perfect rest and holiness of your soul. ⁷⁰ You will no longer fall into the mud of your misconceptions, but as a pure essence, you will no depend upon anything and you will become as the venerable Shiva.

Chapter 25 — Bali Reflects on What His Father Virochana Had Taught

In this manner did my wise father advised me on this subject. Fortunately I remember this now for the enlightenment of my understanding. ² It is now that I feel my aversion to the enjoyments of life. Now by my good luck I come to perceive the bliss of tranquility, like the clear and cooling ambrosial drink of heavenly bliss. ³ I am tired of all my possessions. I am weary of my continued accumulation of wealth to satisfy my endless desires. The life-long care of family has also grown tiresome to me.

⁴ But how charming is this peace and tranquility of my soul, which is quite even and all cool within itself. Here all our pleasures and pains meet upon the same level of equality and detachment. ⁵ I am quite unconcerned with anything and I am highly delighted with my indifference to all things. I am gladdened within myself as by the beams of the full moon. I feel the orb of the full moon rising within myself.

⁸ I have seen the sights of whatever was worth seeing. I have enjoyed enjoyments without limit. I have overcome all beings. But what is the good of all this? ⁹ There is only a reiteration of the very same things that I had there, here and elsewhere. Nowhere do I find anything new, anything that I had not seen or known before.

¹¹ The best things in heaven above, on the earth, and in this infernal region are reckoned to be women and wealth, but the cruel hand of time destroys or wastes all these sooner or later. ¹² All this time I have acted foolishly by waging a continuous struggle with the gods for the sake of trifling worldly possessions. ¹³ What is this phantom of the world? It is only a creation of the brain. Great souls take no delight in it whatsoever. Then what is the harm of forsaking it forever?

¹⁴ Alas! I have spent such a large portion of my lifetime pursuing trifles in the ignorant giddiness of my mind. ¹⁵ My unsteady and fluctuating desires have led me to do many foolish acts in this world of odds and trifles, which now fill me with remorse and regret. ¹⁶ But it is vain to be overwhelmed by the sad thoughts of the past when I should use my courageous efforts to improve the present. ¹⁷ By reflecting on the eternal cause of the endless infinity of souls in the Soul one can attain his perfect joy, just as the gods got ambrosia from the Milky Ocean.

¹⁸ To expel my ignorance in these matters, I must consult my teacher Shukra concerning the ego, the soul, spiritual vision, and the Soul of souls. ¹⁹ I must refer these questions to the most venerable Shukra, who is always uncritical of his favorites. By his advice, I possibly shall settle in the highest perfection of seeing the Supreme Spirit in my spirit. Because the words of the wise are always filled with full meaning and are fruitful of the desired object.

Chapter 26 — Shukra Teaches Bali that All Is Consciousness

So saying the mighty Bali closed his eyes and thought upon the lotus-eyed Shukra living in his heavenly abode. ² Shukra, who was sitting intently meditating on the all-pervading spirit of God, came to know in his mind that he was remembered by his disciple Bali in his city. ³ Then Shukra, the son of Bhrigu whose soul was united with the all-pervading infinite and omniscient Spirit, descended with his heavenly body to the shining window of Bali.

⁴ Bali knew the body of his teacher by its brightness, just as the lotus flower perceives the rising sun by his dawning beams. ⁵ He honored his guru by adoring his feet on a seat decked with gems, and garlanding his guide with mandara flowers. ⁶ As Shukra sat and took his rest from the labor of his journey, his body was strewn with offerings of gems and his head covered with heaps of mandara flowers.

Bali addressed Shukra, ⁷ “Venerable sage, your illustrious presence emboldens me to address you, as the morning sunbeams send all mankind to their daily work. ⁸ Sage, I have come to feel an aversion towards all kinds of worldly enjoyments that produce the delusion of our souls. I want to know the truth about it so I can dispel my ignorance of myself. ⁹ In short, sage, tell me what are these enjoyments good for? How long do they extend? What in reality am I, you, or these other people?”

¹⁰ Shukra answered:—

I can not tell you in length about it as I soon have to return to my place in the sky. Hear me, O monarch of demons, briefly say this much for now.

¹¹ There is truly only consciousness in reality. All other existence is truly consciousness and full of consciousness. The mind is consciousness, and I, you, and these people are collectively the same consciousness. ¹² If you are wise, know you derive everything from this universal Consciousness. Otherwise, all gifts of fortune are as useless to you as offerings of butter on (ordinary) ashes.

¹³ The trap of the mind is to see consciousness as something thinkable, an object of thought. What confers liberation to the soul is the belief that consciousness is free and incomprehensible.

¹⁴ Knowing this for certain, look on everything in the same way. See the Spirit in your spirit in order to arrive at the state of Infinite Spirit.

¹⁶ I tell you, O king, that as long as you are in your body, you must not abstain from your duties, though your mind may be free from everything.

Vasishtha speaking:—

¹⁷ So saying, Shukra flew like a bee smeared with the powdery gold dust of the lotus to the golden roof of heaven. He passed through the watery path of waving clouds to where the revolving planets were ready to receive him.

Chapter 27 — Bali's Detachment

After Shukra, the son of Bhrigu and senior in the assembly of gods and demigods, made his departure, Bali, the best among the intelligent, reflected in this way.

Bali thinking to himself:—

² Truly the seer said that Consciousness composes the three worlds, that I am this Consciousness, and Consciousness fills all the quarters and shows itself in all our actions. ³ It is Consciousness which pervades the inside and outside of everything. There is nothing anywhere which is without Consciousness. ⁴ It is Consciousness that perceives sunbeams and moonlight, or else, had not there been this intellectual perception, there would be no distinction between them and darkness.

⁵ If there were no intellectual perception as this earth is land, then there would be no distinction between earth and water, nor would the word earth apply to land. ⁶ If consciousness could not understand vast space as the quarters of the sky, and the mountains as vast bulges on earth, then who could call the sides of space and mountains by those names? ⁷ If the world were not known as the world and the vacuum as emptiness, then who could distinguish them by the names that are in common use? ⁸ If this big body was not perceived by consciousness, how could we properly call the bodies of embodied beings by their names?

⁹ Consciousness resides in every organ of sense. It dwells in the body, mind and all its desires. Consciousness is in the internal and external parts of the body. Consciousness is all that is in existence and non-existence. ¹⁰ Consciousness forms my whole self by its feeling and knowing everything that I feel and know. Otherwise, without guidance of consciousness, I cannot perceive or conceive or do anything with my body.

¹¹ Of what value is my body which is inert and unconscious as a block of wood? Consciousness makes my self and the intelligent spirit is the Universal Soul. ¹² I am the intellect which resides in the sun and in the sky. I am the consciousness which dwells in the bodies of all beings. I am the same intellect which guides the gods and demigods, and dwells alike in bodies that move and don't move.

¹⁶ There is nothing to be thought of beside Consciousness. There is nothing to be obtained anywhere, except from the spacious womb of Consciousness which comprehends all the three worlds. ¹⁷ But passions and feelings, the mind and its powers, are mere attributes and not properties of Consciousness. Consciousness, being altogether a simple and pure essence, is free from every attribute.

¹⁸ Consciousness (chit) is the Ego, the omnipresent, the all pervasive and ever blissful soul. It is beyond all other attributes, and without duality or parts. ¹⁹ The term Consciousness (chit) as applied to the nameless power of reasoning (chiti) is only a verbal symbol signifying the omniscient Intelligence manifest in all places. ²⁰ The Intellect (chit) is the Supreme Lord that is ever awake and sees all things without manifesting any appearance of himself. He is purely transparent and beyond all visible appearances.

²¹ All its attributes are lame, partial and imperfect. Even time, which has its phases and parts, is not a proper attribute for it. It is only a glimpse of its light that rises before us, but the eternal and infinite light is beyond our comprehension. ²² I must think of Consciousness only in the form of light within my own self. I must know it apart from all other phenomena and thoughts, quite aloof from all shades and colors.

²⁶ I am not subject to the states of pleasure and pain. I am conscious of my self and of no other existence beside myself. I am Consciousness without the phenomena spread out before me. ²⁷ No worldly entity or non-entity can work any change in me, for the possession of worldly objects would destroy me at once (by their separating my soul from God).

²⁸ In my opinion, there can be nothing that is distinct from me when we know all things are produced from the same source. ²⁹ What one gets or loses is no gain or loss to any, because the same Ego always abides in all and is the maker of all pervading everywhere. ³⁰ Whether I am any thought object or not, it matters little for me to know because Consciousness is always a single thing, though its phenomena are endless.

³¹ As long as my soul is not united with the Divine Spirit, I am in sorrow.

Vasishta speaking:—

So reasoning, the most discerning Bali fell to a deep meditation. ³² He reflected on the half mantra of Om, a symbol of Infinite God. He sat quietly with all his desires and fancies lying dormant in him. ³³ He sat undismayed by suppressing his thoughts and his thinking powers within him. He remained with his subdued desires, after having lost consciousness of his meditation, of being the person meditating, and of the object of meditation (i.e., nirvikalpa samadhi).

³⁴ While Bali was entranced in this manner, at the window decorated with gems, he became illumined in his mind like a lamp flame unshaken by the wind. He remained long in his steady posture, like a statue carved of a stone. ³⁵ He sat with his mind as clear as the autumn sky after having cast off all his desires and mental anxieties, filled within himself with his spiritual light.

Chapter 28 — Bali's Meditation, Shukra's Advice to the Demons

Bali's attendant servant demons ascended hastily to his high crystal palace and stood at the door of his chamber. ² There were his ministers Dimbha and others among them, and his generals Kumuda and others also. There were likewise the princes Sura and others in the number, and his champions Vritta and the rest. ³ There were Hayagriva and the other captains of his armies, with his friends Akraja and others. His associates Laduka and some more joined the retinue, with his servants Valluka and many more. ⁴ There were also the gods Kubera, Yama and Indra who paid him their tribute, and the yakshas, vidyadharas and naagas who rendered him their services. ⁵ There were the heavenly nymphs Rambha and Tilottama in the number, with the fanning and flapping women of his court. The deputies of different provinces and of hilly and maritime districts were also in attendance. ⁶ These, accompanied by the spiritual masters inhabiting different parts of the three worlds, all waited at that place to render their services to Bali.

¹⁰ Quick as thought, they saw the shining figure of Shukra standing before them, as if they saw the phantom of their imagination appearing tangibly to view. ¹¹ Shukra, being honored by the demons, took his seat on a sofa. In his silent meditation he saw the state of the mind of the king of demons. ¹² He remained for a while to behold with delight how the mind of Bali was freed from errors by the exercise of its reasoning powers. ¹³ The illustrious teacher, whose personal brightness put to shame the brightness of the Milky Ocean, then said smiling to the listening throng of the demons.
